Mr. Howell, outside of his business, has for half a century been identified with nearly every important enterprise in the city of New Brunswick. He was one of the directors of each of the following banks established in that city: Bank of New Brunswick, Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, Bank of New Jersey, State Bank, First National Bank, and the National Bank of New Jersey. He was also one of the incorporators and a director of the New Brunswick Gas-Light Company, of the New Brunswick Mutual Fire Insurance Company, of the New Brunswick Rubber Company, of the Perth Amboy Steamboat Company, and of the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company. In 1862 he was elected a director of the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, and subsequently of the United Railroads and Canal Companies of New Jersey, and remained such until they were leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. In 1863 he was chosen a director of the Perth Amboy and Woodbridge Railroad Company, of which he was subsequently chosen president, and was also a director and afterwards chosen president of the Millstone and New Brunswick Railroad Company, and continued to hold these offices until these roads were also leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. He is also connected with several insurance companies in New York City. Some years since he was a member of the Common Council, and recorder of the city of New Brunswick, and in 1847 served as mayor. In 1852 he was elected to the lower branch of the State Legislature on the Whig ticket, and by re-election served the two following years, and although frequently requested since to accept other public offices has always declined.

Mr. Howell has always been a prominent participant in the affairs of his native city, and was one of the most active if not the principal one among the distinguished citizens that some few years since waged successful battle against the commissioners of streets and sewers, who, it was claimed, were leading the city into financial ruin through needless and extravagant expenditures.

Mr. Howell was united in marriage on Dec. 23, 1828, to Mary, daughter of George White, of New Brunswick. The surviving children born of this union are Martin A., Jr., of Chicago; Eliza D.; Jane A., wife of Fred DeCoppet, of New York; John Russell; Laura, wife of Abel I. Smith, of Jersey City; and Mary E. The mother died in 1852. His present wife, whom he married in 1859, is Sarah A., daughter of the late John Acken, of New Brunswick, and widow of the late Rev. George Schenck, of Fishkill, N. Y.

In all the positions which Mr. Howell has occupied he has been much esteemed. His judgment is most reliable, and his advice is frequently sought after upon private, public, and corporate affairs. He is possessed of great decision of character, and is fearless in what he considers the right, caring nothing for public or popular opinion and clamor. His rule through life has been to do his best in whatever position he was placed, whether high or low.

CHAPTER XCIV.

Industrial Pursuits.—The industries of New Brunswick may be thus enumerated: Architects, 5; bakers, 15; blacksmiths and wheelwrights, 21; books and stationers, 5; boot and shoe dealers, 47; box manufacturer, 1; broom-factory, 1; buckram and mosquito-netting factory, 1; butchers, 21; carriage-manufactory, 3; carpenters and builders, 21; carpet-weavers, 8; cedar cooper, 1; cement, lime, and sand, 2; cigar box-factory, 1; clothiers and tailors, 19; confectioners, 21; coal, brick, and stone, 10; corsets, 1; china and glassware, 3; cutlery grinding, 2; druggists, 9; dry-goods, 11; dyers, 2; fancy goods and notions, 15; foundries, 3; fruit-dealers, 6; fur goods, 4; furniture-dealers, 6; grain, hay, and feed, 3; groceries, 86; hardware, 3; harness-makers, 7; hats and caps, 6; hides, 3; hotels, 15; house and sign painting, 11; iron and steel, 2; jewelers and watch-makers, 8; leather and shoe findings, 2; leather shoe factories, 7; lime-kiln, 1; locksmiths, 2; lumber-dealers, 2; machine-shops, 3; marble and slate mantels, 1; marble-works, 4; mason and builders, 9; needle-works, 1; oil-dealers, 2; paper-bangings, 2; parasols, canes, and trunks, 1; photographers, 1; picture-frame dealers, 2; plumbing and gas-fitting, 8; plow-manufacture, 1; pottery, 1; printing-offices, 4; pump-factory, 1; roofers, 3; sail-makers, 1; sash and blind-factory, 2; saw-mill, 1; ship-yards, 2; boat builders, 1; soap-works, 1; stair-builders, 1; stonecutters, 2; stoves and tinware, 14; taxidermist, 1; teas, coffees, and spices, 3; besides many minor employments that nothing short of a thorough private census could give us the proper information concerning. As nearly as can be ascertained, however, the industries of this city number over sixty. Sketches of some of the largest of them are given below.

NEW JERSEY RUBBER SHOE COMPANY.—This company, under the name of "New Jersey Rubber Company," was known by that name since 1839, although different companies have been established from the same rubber company. The following interesting historic account gives the early organization of the former companies:

It is a well-known fact that they were started by Horace H. Day, and were the centre of the famous litigation between Charles Goodyear, with his associates, Ford & Co., the Newark Company, the Hayward Rubber Company, and the L. Candee Company on the one side, and Day on the other, for the latter's infringements of the Goodyear patent. It was here that Day built his first little shop, still standing on Dennis Street and now a part of the great works, and here that he enlarged his business, made mints of money as the phrase goes, and persisted in his persecution of poor Goodyear until finally beaten in the courts by the last great effort of Daniel Webster. For years it yielded him an annual profit of fifty thousand dollars on shirred goods, a great portion of the money going to sustain his suits with the patentee.

It was about 1839 that Day started his little Dennis Street shop, and turned out carriage-cloth made by spreading over cloth rubber dissolved in turpentine, and shoes made from the rubber uppers that came from Paris, by fitting them upon leather bottoms. As soon as the Goodyear vulcanization process came out in 1844, Day claimed the right to use it as an unpatented English invention, and began making the improved shoes. After prosecuting him, Goodyear compromised by permitting him to make exclusively shirred goods, leaving the shoe manufacture to Onderdonk & Letson, the Newark Company, Ford & Co., and the Naugatuck Company. This compromise was violated, and lawsuits followed in regular succession, until Mr. Day was finally vanquished. Meanwhile being helped by several of our citizens, who had known him from his boyhood (he came here early in life to live with his uncle), he had enlarged his works gradually until they came to occupy the very large space they now fill.

The high chimney bears the inscription of 1858, with his name, and it was but two years later that he gave way to the Goodyear Elastic Fabric Company. The work of this company for the next four years is indicated by its name, and in 1864 William Judson bought out the works and ran them for two years. Rubber blankets for use in the war were now a prominent feature of the business, the vacant lot on the east side of Dennis Street being filled with racks of the sun-drying cloth. In 1866, Cornwell, Murphy & Bennet came into control of the works, but soon sold out to the Manhattan Rubber Company. This concern lasted but a short time when it failed, and the factory lay idle for a long time. In the fall of 1869, Mr. Christopher Meyer bought the works and associated with him Messrs. Ford and Hyatt, the three forming the Hyatt Rubber Company. This name was not continued a full year, but was changed to the New Jersey Rubber Company, which went into operation with a capital stock of two hundred thousand dollars in April, 1870. President, L. L. Hyatt; Treasurer, Christopher Meyer; Secretary, James B. Ford; Superintendent, J. H. Canfield.

Few men have had more varied and valuable experience in the rubber business than President Hyatt. Formerly engaged with Mr. Meyer at Milltown, in the year 1855 he went out in the employ of Hutchinson, Henderson & Co., to superintend their factory near Montargis, France. The factory was an immense one, ranged along three sides of a rectangle, with the most spacious and elegant grounds beyond, shaded with trees and watered by a canal, which served also for shipping goods to the main canal beyond. From here he went to Paris to superintend the very large works of the Compagnie Nationale, there making boots and shoes, clothing, hose-packing, and all mechanical goods. In 1857 Mr. Christopher Meyer planned a prodigious manufactory at Edinburgh, Scotland. He had stocked the building now occupied by the Novelty Rubber Company with machinery for which he had no use when the hard rubber-works began operations there, and it occurred to him to utilize it by organizing a foreign factory. He therefore sent Messrs. Norris and Pannlee with it to Edinburgh, and bought for the new works the immense buildings of the Castle Silk-Mills. Two years later, at his request, Mr. Hyatt took charge of these new works, which manufactured on a tremendous scale, employing over a thousand operatives, including at one time five hundred girls, and turning out fourteen thousand pairs of shoes per day, besides hose, clothing, etc. Mr. Hyatt came back to this country in 1869, when the control of the Castle mills passed into other hands (Messrs. Meyer & Ford still retaining stock, however), and took charge of these New Jersey works, now idle and rusty. He at once went to work preparing for their successful operation, and in April, 1870, started them. The buildings were the same as those left by Day in 1860, occupying about two-thirds of the block facing Dennis, Neilson, and Richmond, and measuring two hundred and thirty by forty-five feet, one hundred and twenty-five by thirty feet, each three stories, and one hundred and fifty by thirty feet, two stories, and since that time until the present enlargements have been made as the business extended. At the present time the building of a large brick extension is in contemplation. New ovens and furnaces have been constructed, and numerous additions made to the machinery. The largest calender in America is set up here, its face of roll being five feet, the diameter of the roll nearly two feet. It was built at the National Iron-Works of this city, and is a triumph of iron work, for although eight feet high, it could be managed perfectly in every particular by a man on the floor without changing his position.

In the month of August, 1876, a fire destroyed most of this structure, and since then it has been built and remodeled, and now, with the proposed improvements, will be one of the largest structures for manufacturing rubber in the world. It now employs a large number of hands, nearly equally divided between the sexes, and every day turns out thousands of pairs of shoes, as well as rubber boots and carriage-cloth. It has changed the name since 1877 to the New Jersey Rubber Shoe Company, with John R. Ford as president; Christopher Meyer, treasurer; Howard Meyer, secretary; and John C. Meyer, superintendent. With regard to the work of this factory, it may be stated that it occupies an A 1 place in the market, and is bound to keep at the head of it.

JANEWAY & CO., PAPER HANGINGS.—This establishment was commenced in 1844 by John P. Hardenbergh, and in the fall of 1845 Henry L. Janeway became interested. In 1848, William R. Janeway became one of the firm, and in 1849 Mr. Hardenbergh retired, and the firm became Janeway & Co. They began with a factory measuring forty feet by twenty-five; they now use an immense structure facing on Water Street and the canal, covering nearly two acres of ground and measuring, the main building, fifty by two hundred and fifty-four feet. Their coloring-house is a large building attached, and they have a large engine-room with a seventy-horse engine, and steam pipes are carried all over the building, bringing it to one temperature. Ordinary wall-paper is printed from maple rollers, which have been seasoned for several years in the factory and then accurately turned. Gilt paper and water-colors are printed from maple blocks, having a cross-grained pine back.

There are between one and two hundred hands employed, and the factory turns out nearly three million rolls of paper-hangings, borders, and a large quantity of window-shades per year, consumes tons of paper, also of clay and colors, chemicals, and over five hundred tons of coal.

The following is from an earlier account of these works: In printing, Janeway & Co. use nine printing-machines made by Waldeon, of this city, including one twelve-color, four eight-color, and four six-color machines, costing from twelve hundred to three thousand five hundred dollars. Machines are made at a cost of over ten thousand dollars each, which print as many as eighteen colors, being twenty-five feet in diameter, with the effect, of course, of producing gaudy and cheap-looking patterns. The drying in all the processes is done by hanging the fabrics over steam pipes, where they are conveyed by a peculiar machine invented by Mr. Janeway, but never patented, which saves the handling that was formerly necessary, to the great injury of the wet paper.

The secret was let out by one of their discharged employees, and the machines are now in use both in this country and in England, where one of the manufacturers claims it saves him one hundred pounds per day.

Before being printed, however, grounding is first put upon the paper. Clay from Amboy and the South—the whitest being from England—is pulverized in large mills and mixed with coloring to the desired shade, and also mixed with sizing to make the printing colors hold better to the paper. The process of printing gold and silver paper is quite an interesting one. These papers have been made in France, where formerly all the paper-hanging manufacturing was done for many years, and the gilt paper has been long made in this country also; the silver paper, though formerly in fashion, was discontinued until two or three years ago, since which it has been introduced by the efforts of Janeway & Co. Velvet paper is made by flock being put on in the same way as the bronze, flock being a French preparation of woolen cloth ground up and colored. Water-colors are put on by hand-blocks. For borders of the common variety the printing-machines may be used, but the better kinds are printed with hand-blocks. Window-shades are printed from blocks on wide machines.

The designing is a very nice part of the business, the aim being to suit and attract the public according to the varying fashions which prevail in wall-paper as well as in clothing. As we have said, this factory's work stands high in the market for excellence and durability of material, for elegance of design, and for artistic finish, and it occupies a very important place among the industries of the city. Their business extends from Maine to California, and all of the States north of the Southern States. For a time there was very severe competition; some of the New York firms lost large amounts of money, while Janeway & Co.,

NORFOLK AND NEW BRUNSWICK HOSEIENY COMPANY,

with their extensive facilities for business, still carried on their business in this city and outlived all competition, and owing to the severity of this competition they came to an agreement of uniformity of price, which system has its advantages and disadvantages, but is believed to be the best system according to the views of a majority of manufacturers.

The design of this establishment is to send one of the firm to Paris every year, to obtain the designs (which in France is a business by itself). They are continually receiving letters complimenting their artistic styles and manner of manufacturing. They have also an extensive store-house, where their goods are packed ready for the market.

FURNITURE, CORNELIUS POWELSON.—This large manufactory of furniture of Cornelius Powelson was located on the corner of George and Schureman Streets, in 1847. It was at that time the beginning of a large business in this city, which sprang from a small shop on the corner of New and George Streets. The trade increased until he erected his present four-story brick structure and launched out into exclusively first-class furniture and upholstery work. The designs are made according to the wish of his customers, and the result is that he equals the best dealers in New York, and sells a great deal cheaper. He uses the very best of choice veneers and woods, and his work is known all over the country.

CONFECTIONERY ESTABLISHMENT.—About the year 1850, Mr. William Frank opened a small place on the east side of Peace Street, and began to manufacture and sell goodies to an admiring public of little ones. This was the day of small things, but in 1873 he had a large confectionery store, with an extensive toy establishment, the goods being imported from Germany. He still employs a number of men at 15 Peace Street in the manufacture of every description of French and American candies, numbering over two hundred varieties. He supplies at wholesale the stores in the various country towns within twenty miles of the city, which, with his city sales, bring up his business to over twenty thousand dollars annually. We have not space for a description in detail of the various processes, machines, and moulds required in the making of the multitude of varieties of goods, but we may say they belie the old joke about the reluctance of those who see candy made to eat it.

MCCRELLIS BROTHERS' CARRIAGE MANUFACTORY, established in 1851. The three brothers McCrellis began the manufacture of carriages, wagons, and sleighs in their new factory on Somerset Street. They have become one of the most extensive manufacturing firms in this city, employing a large number of workmen, constructing handsome carriages equal to any other manufactory, and have made for themselves a reputation for the excellence of make and durability of material second to none in the country.

NORFOLK AND NEW BRUNSWICK HOSIERY COMPANY.—Established in 1866. Office, Neilson Street, above railroad bridge. President, Johnson Letson; Secretary and Treasurer, John N. Carpenter. It is said that this is the largest manufactory, and the manufactory making the best goods in the hosiery line in America, and that the machinery used makes it altogether superior to any similar establishment in the world. It is under charge of the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company, which has an interesting history.

About fifteen years ago Messrs. I. K. and E. E. Kilbourn being engaged in making yarn in Norfolk, Conn., determined to get a hand-knitting machine to use some of it up. While working this they gradually introduced improvements until they thoroughly mastered the principles of the machine, and conceived an original idea in the construction of one, namely, an automatic motion,—something that had been often tried but never accomplished. They went on to New York and endeavored to form a company on the patent they had obtained, but met with no success until they enlisted their former townsman, Mr. L. P. Porter, then engaged in the rubber business in New York, in the enterprise. The works were established in Norfolk in 1858 on a capital of seventy-five thousand dollars, and the goods made there were of a coarse gauge. Messrs. Porter and E. E. Kilbourn meanwhile visited Europe to inspect foreign works, but found nothing like Kilbourn's machines. From 1858 on the works at the Norfolk factory continued to increase, and a great difficulty met the company in the fact that there were not people enough in the vicinity to keep even with the works in seaming the made goods. Mr. Porter having now relinquished the rubber for the hosiery business, looked about New York and Brooklyn for a new factory, and at the suggestion of the Messrs. Dayton, who were directors, and whose acquaintance he had made in former business transactions, came out to this city to look at the building formerly occupied by the New Brunswick Rubber Company, near the railroad bridge. Dissatisfied with this, he gave up the plan of locating here until his attention was called in the cars on the homeward trip by Mr. James Bishop to the old cotton-factory of Col. Neilson, near the Novelty Rubber Works. He came back and looked at it, and was delighted with its adaptation to the business. The factory and machinery were bought, much of the latter being put to use; the new company was incorporated. Since then constant improvements have been made, and extensions to the buildings. The original factory, with excellent water-power, at Norfolk, Conn., turning out a large amount of the coarse kind of work, and in New Brunswick the factory is devoted to the finest and best work made in this country, four large buildings being devoted to its manufacture, while others are in process of erection.

The old wooden saw-mill of Col. Neilson, near the upper canal locks, is also in full operation as a picking department. Large buildings for shirt and drawer knitting-loom, and also stocking-loom, are in operation. The amount of capital is over five hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and about one million dollars of annual product. The following gentlemen were among the first in its organization, and held office up to 1874:

L. P. Porter, Jonathan Earle, James Dayton, Johnson Letson, Jacob S. Carpenter, T. Deland, M. A. Howell, W. W. Welsh, James Neilson, S. V. Hoffman.

The goods thus turned out are sold by the company exclusively, the main dealers being those like Stewart and Clafin, of New York, and with these the goods rank next to imported in reputation and price. In quality and true worth they are superior to the imported, and would crowd the latter out of the market if it were not for the names "domestic" and "foreign," which mean so much to some classes of people. It is a fact, however, that the demand is greater than the factory can supply, and is rapidly increasing.

The following is a description of this immense establishment, the largest in the world, covering fully six acres of ground:

Mill No. 1.....	50	by 222 feet,	4 stories.

The buildings are all brick, and kept in complete order and repair. Over three million pounds of wool are used in the manufacture of hosiery, and over two thousand tons of coal consumed. This immense establishment employs one thousand men, women, girls and boys.

The following comprise the board of directors: Johnson Letson, president; John N. Carpenter, secretary and treasurer; Mahlin Runyon, Lewis T. Howell, James Neilson, Christopher Meyer, Augustus F. Libby, William W. Welch, John Van Deventer.

The head manager, who has charge of the entire establishment, having a large number of foremen superintending over one thousand operators, Henry McMurry.

JOHNSON LETSON, merchant and manufacturer, of New Brunswick, N. J., was born in that place Dec. 8, 1806. He is the son of Thomas and Ann Letson, both of whom were natives of New Jersey, the former having been born at the Raritan Landing, Oct. 12, 1763, the latter at Piscataway in 1774. The father, while yet a young man, removed to New Brunswick, where he established the leather manufacturing business, pursuing it until about 1832, when he retired to his farm at Three-Mile Run, where he resided until his death, May 13, 1851. The mother died in New Brunswick, October, 1856, at the residence of her son, the subject of this sketch.

Young Johnson Letson was educated in New Brunswick, closing his education at the grammar school auxiliary to Rutgers College, in the main building of which it was then held, under the Rev. John Mabon, D.D. His education, though not polite, was solid, like the understanding it trained, and afforded, on the whole, a fair preparation for the long and active and useful life before him. When about the age of fourteen he went to New York as clerk in a hardware store, where he remained for some three years, after which he returned to New Brunswick, where he served in the same capacity until 1827, when he again went to New York, engaging this time in the book business, which he pursued for about two years, and then sold out, returning once more to his native city.

The needle in his life's compass now began to rest, and seeing his way clearly, he followed it henceforward steadily.

In March, 1830, he started the hardware business in Burnet Street, New Brunswick, and prosecuted it there till 1855, a quarter of a century, when, content with his large success, and desiring a more quiet and retired life, he disposed of all his interests in it, and has since devoted himself mainly to the discharge of his duties as an officer of various corporations, conspicuously the duties devolving on him as president of the New Brunswick Rubber Company, an office which he has held since the organization of the company in 1850. In connection with several other gentlemen he organized in 1863 the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company, of which he was then made one of the directors; and upon the decease of Lucius P. Porter, its first president, in 1876, Jacob S. Carpenter was chosen president pro tem., and filled the office until 1877, when Mr. Letson was chosen president of the company, which position he has held since. He has been one of the directors of the National Bank of New Jersey at New Brunswick since its organization, was chosen one of the directors of the Willow Grove Cemetery Association upon its organization, and for several years has been its president.

In 1863 he was elected a member of the board of trustees of Rutgers College, and for several years past has acted as chairman of its finance committee.

In April, 1870, upon the organization of the Particular Synod of New Brunswick (Reformed Church), Mr. Letson was appointed its treasurer, and has continued the incumbent of the office since. In January, 1875, he was induced to take the treasurership of the Middlesex County Bible Society on account of some irregularity in its former accounts.

There would seem to be no relief for him when he accepted an office at the hands of a corporation. Such is the sense of his business capacity and of his general trustworthiness, that if he serves once he has no choice but to serve as long as he is able to.

Johnson Setson

Lucius C. Porter

Glorious servitude, in which the fetters are forged of honor and fastened by esteem. Mr. Letson has never taken an active part in politics, although long ago he served as a member of the City Council for several years, and was always identified with the Whig party before it was dissolved, as he has been with the Republican party since its organization. He is, indeed, as little of a politician as is consistent with good citizenship, his catholic tastes and his broad feelings chafing against the limitations set up by political organizations. In 1830 he married Eliza L., daughter of Cornelius and Eliza W. Shaddle, of the city of New York. Their two surviving daughters are Amelia L., wife of Rev. Theodore B. Romeyn, of Hackensack; Mary S., wife of William H. Acken, of New Brunswick. One daughter, Ann Elizabeth, died a young lady, another died an infant.

LUCIUS PHELPS PORTER.—His father, Capt. Henry Porter, was a prosperous farmer of Coldbrook, Conn., and removed to Norfolk, in the same State, with his family in 1823, where both himself and wife died. The family consisted of four sons and two daughters, of whom only Frederick E. Porter, superintendent of the Norfolk Hosiery Company at Norfolk, survives in 1882.

The maternal grandfather of Lucius P. Porter was Capt. Jeremiah Phelps, a prominent and influential citizen of Norfolk. Lucius P. Porter was born at Coldbrook, May 14, 1818, and remained at home, spending his time between the routine of farm-work and attending school until the age of seventeen years, when he began a business life for himself, and for two years was a clerk in a store at Norfolk. He was a clerk afterwards for a few years for Paulus Warner at Plymouth, Conn., and subsequently for Henry Terry, of Colchester, with whom after one year he formed a copartnership in business.

During the continuance of his business relations with Mr. Terry he first took an interest in manufacturing, the firm being the owners of the Plymouth Woolen-Mills. In 1848, Mr. Porter removed to New York, retaining his connection with the mills, and in 1851, with two other gentlemen, who also with him had become possessed of valuable patents, organized the New York Rubber Company, which has since become one of the most prominent in the country. He superintended the building of the branch mills at Fiskkill, N. Y., was the principal in developing the large business of the company, and remained a trustee and actively connected with the concern to the time of his death, April 2, 1876.

In 1857, Mr. Porter, with several other capitalists, among whom was Jonathan Letson, Esq., present president of the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company, of New Brunswick, and the late Charles P. and James Dayton, of the same place, organized the Norfolk Hosiery Company at Norfolk, Conn., with a capital of seventy-five thousand dollars, of which he was chosen as treasurer. In 1859 the stock of the company was increased to one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, and the company arranged to manufacture fully fashioned hosiery by steam-power. In 1863 the demand for the company's goods so increased that it was found necessary to enlarge their facilities for manufacturing, and after prospecting in New York, Brooklyn, and other places, Mr. Letson was authorized to purchase the property now occupied by the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company in New Brunswick, where a large branch of the business has been carried on since. Mr. Porter was chosen president of the company, whose capital stock was subsequently increased to five hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and soon after took up his residence in New Brunswick, where he resided until his decease. He was public-spirited, enterprising, and largely instrumental in establishing the largest and one of the most important of the manufactories of the city. Always interested in every worthy local enterprise that tended to the prosperity of the city and the welfare of its citizens, he supported them morally and liberally financially, and from his first settlement in New Brunswick until his death he was known as kind-hearted, upright, and a promoter of good society, and given to deeds of charity. He was a much-esteemed member of the First Presbyterian Church for many years, and one of its board of trustees.

Mr. Porter was twice married, and left a widow and two daughters.

On April 3, 1876, following his decease, the Board of Water Commissioners of the city held a meeting for the purpose, and among other appropriate resolutions passed the following:

"Resolved, That in his official relations as a director of the New Brunswick Water Company from June 24, 1868, to April 30, 1873, and as president of the Board of Water Commissioners of the city of New Brunswick from that time to the close of his life, he has given his time, already overoccupied, and his superior executive abilities to the business of the Board of the city, without other compensation than the satisfaction of seeing a public work of the highest importance to all of our citizens wisely and economically conducted, and in such a way as to best meet the present and future demands to be made upon it. As those who well know the valuable services of Mr. Porter in this work, we desire to express, for ourselves and for our citizens, the high estimate we put upon his labors for this cause."

On the same day, at a meeting called for the purpose, the directors of the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company, with other resolutions, passed the following:

"Resolved, That since the organization of this company Mr. Porter has been its trusted and faithful president, and to his untiring devotion and wise and prudent management it owes its growth and prosperity. In all their relations with Mr. Porter the members of this Board have found him a noble and sympathizing friend, a public-spirited citizen, sacrificing private conveniences to public interests, and a high-minded, unimpeachable officer, who gave the best energies of his life to the faithful discharge of his duties."

JANEWAY & CARPENDER, MANUFACTURERS OF PAPER-HANGINGS.—This firm is characterized by a strong determination to excel those who can date back their organization a score or two of years. The factory was established in 1863, their office in Neilson Street above railroad bridge, by Messrs. Belcher & Nicholson, the latter being a retiring partner of the firm of Janeway & Co. It turned out principally bronzes and what are technically known as French drawn stripes and mouldings. In January, 1870, Mr. Charles J. Carpender bought out the interest of Mr. Belcher, and the firm of Nicholson & Carpender continued the business until July, 1872, when Mr. Nicholson retired and Col. Jacob J. Janeway, formerly with Janeway & Co., formed a copartnership under the name of Janeway & Carpender. The business was at once extended to include the printing of blanks and satins, and the firm has met with such success that further additions to the size and capacity of the works were found needed. Sales have been made by the firm all over this country and in Canada to jobbers and to the trade, and the products of the establishment are circulated far and wide. Their works occupy large buildings and employ a large number of hands.

They turn out the different varieties of blanks, satins, tints, gold and silver paper, and French drawn stripes and mouldings. It is not necessary, since we have already described the process of printing, to enter upon any delineation of this kind of work at this factory.

But the great specialty of this factory is its French drawn mouldings and stripes, which we have not yet had occasion to describe. The former are used in paneling off a room in imitation of fresco, the mouldings being surmounted by caps and corners to complete the panels. The French drawn stripes, which are made by but one other concern in the country, are exquisite combinations and shades of stripes which take the place of figures in wall-paper. The process of making the stripes and mouldings is the same, though several considerations unite to make the cost of production of the latter greater than of the other. In mouldings corners are printed by hand separately, and they with their corresponding mouldings are fitted round a centre of plain or fancy paper for the interior of the panel. In making the stripes and mouldings the colors, which are all mixed on the premises, are poured into "pans," a separate one being required to be made for each pattern. The pan is a tin box as long as the pattern is wide, and its section is triangular. It is divided into compartments, which are of course triangular in shape, and are open at the base and have apertures at the apex. Each of these compartments is filled with a separate color, and a succession of them contains all the colors of a pattern in consecutive order. The pan then is only to be set on edge and the paper to be passed under it for each color to flow out of the aperture of its compartment and imprint itself upon the paper, the color being fed as fast as used by little gutters at the side, from which separate slits in the tin lead to the various compartments. Thus the colors in the order of the pattern are printed in what appears to be a very simple style, without blurring or running together. Mouldings are commonly made in this country by printing, but by that process each pattern requires as many impressions as there are colors, and by this simpler process of using pans the whole is done at once and better, and of course cheaper.

The firm shows its enterprise and appreciation of public taste by bringing out nearly one hundred patterns in the different goods every year, besides working over old rollers in brown blanks. This paper-hanging factory is one of the best in this country, doing excellent work with novel designs in French mouldings and stripes as are to be found in this country or in Europe.

ROLFE & SON'S SAW-MILL.—This city possesses but one saw-mill, that of Isaac Rolfe & Son. In the year 1863, Mr. Rolfe established himself, with Mr. G. W. Metlar, in the saw-mill at the foot of New Street, in Burnet Street. The old Neilson mill for years had stopped work. The necessity of a mill for the convenience of many having use for sawed timber, became urgent, and this mill was built. Since then the grounds have been enlarged to meet the growing demands of business, and now measure one hundred and eighty feet on Burnet Street by three hundred feet deep, the canal front being about three hundred and forty feet. The mill does a large amount of sawing and planing required by the sales of the firm, and most of the timber—white pine, hemlock, oak, chestnut, ash, etc.—is brought direct from Pennsylvania, New York, Maine, Illinois, and from Canada, and the total cost per year reaching over $100,000. Mr. Rolfe's son, John Rolfe, the junior partner, has the active superintendency, and employs nearly one hundred men throughout the year.

THE MEYER RUBBER COMPANY.—Established at Milltown in 1844, incorporated in 1861, for the manufacture of rubber boots and shoes. President, Christopher Meyer; Treasurer, John R. Ford; Superintendent, John C. Evans.

In the year 1839 Mr. Meyer came to New Brunswick from Newark to put up for Mr. Horace H. Day the first steam-engine and machinery for the first rubber operations ever carried on in this city. Mr. Day was then making carriage-cloth and rubber shoes, but his carriage-cloth was so odorous as to be intolerable, and was moreover so soft that when the carriage top was put down the folds of the cloth stuck together and peeled off, and his shoes in summer were similarly unfit for use, while in winter they became hard as bricks. It was here that Mr. Christopher Meyer, who had begun his investigations soon after Goodyear and Day, made his first essay at manufacturing, and here obtaining his right under the Goodyear patent, and fighting the battles with Day under the Goodyear banner, he went on inventing and improving machinery and perfecting the progress of rubber shoe making, and to-day no man in the world more thoroughly understands all the branches and details of the rubber trade than Mr. Meyer. He is the leading spirit of three companies here,—the Meyer Works at Milltown, the New Jersey Rubber Shoe Company, and the Novelty Hard Rubber Works,—every one in a prosperous condition and occupying an important place in the rubber trade.

And Mr. Meyer discovered a plan by which the odor was almost entirely obviated, and the cloth and shoes rendered more durable,—a plan, in fact, which was only surpassed by the subsequently-discovered process of vulcanization. Mr. Day refused to recognize the value of this process, and Mr. Meyer thereupon decided to leave his employ, a determination he insisted upon, even when Mr. Day reconsidered his refusal. In 1840, therefore, Mr. Meyer started on his own account near the Landing Bridge, and stayed there three months. Messrs. Hutchinson & Onderdonk had meanwhile dissolved partnership in their Water Street rubber-factory, and the latter started the rubber-manufacture in the old saw-mill of James Neilson, near what is now the upper lock of the canal, the former going to Newark. Mr. Onderdonk failing in his experiment, Mr. Meyer bought him out, and ran the works with his own machinery for two years. He was so successful that Mr. Onderdonk bought him out in turn, and, associated with Mr. Johnson Letson, started the works under the name of Onderdonk & Letson (this firm subsequently merging into the New Brunswick Rubber Company).

Mr. J. C. Ackerman now proposed to Mr. Meyer to build him a factory on the site of the old Milltown grist-mill, and this was done, Mr. James Bishop joining with Mr. Meyer in the management. This was in 1843. The next year the works were started, and engaged in the manufacture of shirred goods, carriage-cloth, and rubber shoes with leather buttons, the latter being soon substituted by the Goodyear "metallic" or all rubber shoes, for though Mr. Goodyear had a patent it was not respected, the process immediately becoming common property.

Before this process of vulcanization was understood the rubber had to be dissolved in turpentine and acids. The caoutchouc was received from Para in three forms,—in sheets, in bottles, and in rough shoes made by dipping clay moulds in the sap. These three forms were all utilized by Mr. Meyer; the rough shoes were fur-tipped and prepared for sale, the gum bottles were dissolved and spread over cloth for carriage-cloths, the imported sheets were cut into fore-uppers and joined with cloth quarters to cover leather soles for shoes. In this manner the works turned out some one thousand pairs of shoes per week. They also turned out rubber ponton-bridges and boats for government use in the Mexican war. In 1845 the factory was burned down with Mr. Meyer's residence, leaving him absolutely without a cent of capital or stock or machinery. Mr. John R. Ford then came in and furnished capital to start the works anew, and under the name of Ford & Co. they continued in operation for several years. The new buildings measured twenty-five by one hundred and thirty and thirty by forty feet, and with them the business steadily grew and improvements were made until 1851, when a second fire visited the works. In the following year a stock company was formed named the Ford Rubber Company, and the present buildings were occupied. In 1858 the name of the company was changed to the Meyer Rubber Company, and so it still remains.

The process of manufacturing boots and shoes we have already described in detail, and for all its branches this factory is perfectly equipped, even sawing its own boards and making its own packing-boxes.

As we have already remarked, it is at this factory that most of the improvements in machinery have been invented and perfected. For example, the sole of a rubber shoe was formerly made in three parts, because there were needed three different thicknesses for the sole, the shank, and the heel. Here a machine was invented which converted a sheet of rubber at once into shoe-soles of three thicknesses in one piece all ready for the uppers. The machinery for making the present style of sandal was prepared here, and also the patent engraved steel-roll, by which a permanent impression is made upon the upper to resemble the ridge effect obtained in other factories by laying rubber cords on top of the fore-upper. This machine, by saving the manufacture of the cord, cheapens the cost over a cent and a half per pair, and saves a large amount per year to the companies who have the right to use it. Altogether the Meyer Rubber-Works are interesting, not only for the large extent of their business, but as the birthplace of most of the improved machinery for making rubber shoes, and as the origin of all the new styles of shoes which the market brings out.

CHRISTOPHER MEYER, son of John Christopher Meyer, was born in Hanover, Germany, Oct. 15, 1818. At the age of fifteen he left his native country thinking to better his condition in life, and, as others had done before him, find in America a reward for faithful toil and a competency for the industrious and self-reliant man. He landed in New York in 1834, where he remained for two years. Being of a naturally ingenious turn of mind, and having some knowledge of machinery, he, in 1836, went to Newark, where he engaged in a machine-shop, and had worked one year when he was intrusted with the superintendence of setting up a mill at Ramapo for Hugh Maxwell. In 1838 he was selected by Mr. Connors, his employer at Newark, to assist Horace Day, of New Brunswick, in perfecting patterns, machinery, etc., for operating in the manufacture of rubber goods. Mr. Day found in young Meyer a valuable assistant, who not only designed but completed just what was wanted for the purpose, and engaged his services for two years, promising him large returns. When this time was nearly served, Mr. Meyer saw that his most valuable talent was being used for the benefit of his employer without any prospects of the promised return, and he resolved, although without capital in money, to start business for himself.

He spent his evenings, after days of hard labor, in making his patterns, and soon had his machinery ready for a beginning. Through the assistance of James Bishop, who lent him three hundred dollars, he started business in a small way at Landing Bridge, on the canal, and manufactured rubber shoes and rubber carriage cloth. After six months he removed to Weston's Mills, and that location not proving suitable he rented of Peter C. Onderdonk the upper part of his saw-mill at the upper lock, where he carried on business for two years, and sold the business to Peter C. Onderdonk, which was the germ that developed into the New Brunswick Rubber Company. Mr. Meyer then rented a place of Messrs. Ackerman & Bishop, erected on purpose for him at Milltown, which, after he had carried on business one year, burned down, and swept with it nearly his entire effects. He rebuilt the works, and associated with him in business in 1845 John R. Ford, a dry-goods merchant of New Brunswick, and the firm of Ford & Co. continued business until 1850, when the company was organized under the general law as a joint-stock concern, under the name of "Ford Rubber Company," with Judge Ford as president and his son, John R. Ford, as treasurer. After four years the name was changed to "Meyer Rubber Company," and Mr. Meyer has been president since, with John R. Ford as treasurer, they holding and controlling since its organization the majority of the stock.

In 1853, Messrs. Meyer & Ford built the Novelty Rubber Company Mills at New Brunswick, which after one year they sold, transported their machinery to Edinburgh, Scotland, and organized the North British Rubber Company in 1854, in which they held a controlling interest until 1872, and since have been only stockholders.

In 1868 they purchased the New Jersey Rubber Company's works at New Brunswick, with which Mr. Day had been connected, as before alluded to, which, however, soon after were destroyed by fire. In 1877, Mr. Meyer organized a new company, "The New Jersey Rubber Shoe Company," and erected commodious brick buildings on Little Burnet Street, in New Brunswick. He was also chosen president of this company, and controls a large part of its capital stock, which is used in the manufacture of rubber boots and shoes and pipes, canes, etc.

Mr. Meyer became interested in the rubber business of New Brunswick when in its infancy, and to him alone is largely due its development, which has made such rapid strides among the most important manufactures of America. This interest has increased under his management and superior executive ability from a business of a few thousand dollars until it reaches several millions annually. He persevered and met every obstacle to its success at the beginning, and by persistency of effort, good financing, and judicious management has placed his manufactured goods in the principal markets of the world, ranking among the best of their kind.

Mr. Meyer may be safely classed among the self-made business men of the times, and an example of what properly directed ambition and a will to succeed under adverse circumstances may achieve.

Outside of his rubber interests, Mr. Meyer has been identified with many other important interests in New Brunswick and other places. He was a director and large stockholder in the old State Bank of New Brunswick, is a director of the New Brunswick Gaslight Company, was one of the projectors and owners of the Painesville and Youngstown Railroad, which he built in 1863 in connection with Mr. Ford, and sold out the same in October, 1881; a director of the New York and Boston and New York and Northern Railroads, a director and president of the Nashua-nick Company, of the East Hampton Rubber Thread Company, and of the Glendale Elastic Fabrics Company of East Hampton, Mass; a director of the German-American Fire Insurance Company, of the Municipal Gaslight Company, and of the American Bank-Note Engraving Company of New York.

Mr. Meyer was united in marriage in 1840 to Margaret Evans, of Belleville, N. J., who died in 1877, leaving the following children: Martha, widow of the late William A. Gray, of New York; Mary, deceased, was the wife of Henry A. Taylor, of New York; John C., a stockholder in, and manager of, the New Jersey Rubber Shoe Company's works at New Brunswick; Kate, wife of George Lowther, of New York; Margaret; Clara, wife of Charles Greer, of New York; and Howard Meyer, confidential secretary for his father at their business office, 114 Duane Street, New York City.

THE NOVELTY RUBBER COMPANY.—This company was established in 1855. The works are in Neilson Street above the railroad bridge. They are manufacturers of hard rubber, etc. President, Christopher Meyer; Secretary, Nicholas Williamson.

The following is an interesting account of this company and the manufacturing of hard rubber goods for the market: The buildings were erected two years previous to 1855 by Mr. John R. Ford and Christopher Meyer, and used for a month or two for grinding the Milltown factory's rubber, the machinery being subsequently removed to that factory; since that time the works have been in almost constant operation. The buildings are of good size, some thirty by one hundred feet, two stories; forty by one hundred feet, five stories. The engine-room is forty feet square. The goods manufactured amount to nearly $600,000 per annum, and include every possible variety of hard rubber goods, as the following list will show: buttons in great variety of styles; smokers' requisites, such as pipes, pipe-stems, and bowls in great diversity of shapes, sizes, and prices, tobacco- and pipe-boxes, cigar-cases, match-boxes, etc.; crochet-hooks, knitting-pins, and tatting-needles; a variety of articles used in trimming ladies' dresses. In the line of stationery goods they manufacture round rulers of all sizes; also poker, hotel, restaurant, billiard, and jewelers' checks in great variety; key tags and business of all kinds; elegant canes in immense variety, with plain crooks or ornamented with ivory or rubber trimmings, knotted crooks with carved rubber heads and ivory trimmings; canes of innumerable variety, and many other goods, under the name of "Yankee notions."

W. M. W.

These goods are shipped to all parts of the world. Germany and England is a large market, also Cape Town, South Africa, Australia, Central and South America, where these goods are in large demand, and these in addition to the large quantities of goods sold to pipe manufacturers and dealers in this country.

The upper story of the main building is used for a paper-box manufactory, to supply the works with boxes for the shipment of their goods, so that from the reception of the caoutchouc gum to the packing and shipping of the goods the factory is completely furnished with all facilities for setting new styles and making great quantities of them. The company is working with a capital stock, which is all paid in, and is in a very prosperous condition, having the monopoly of its specialties and not abusing its powers.

THE NEW BRUNSWICK RUBBER COMPANY.—This company was established in 1849. Their buildings are in Washington Street near Peace. They manufacture rubber boots and shoes. President, Johnson Letson; Secretary and Treasurer, K. T. B. Spader.

They are among the best manufacturers who supply the American trade, some years exceeding five hundred thousand pairs of rubber boots and shoes, amounting to nearly $700,000, and employing nearly three hundred hands.

The company bought out from Onderdonk & Letson the Goodyear rights in 1849, and organized under a charter early in 1850, with the following corporators: Johnson Letson, Charles P. Dayton, James Hutchings, D. B. Stelle, P. C. Onderdonk, J. C. Ackerman, John Acken, M. A. Howell, William McDonald, P. P. Runyon, Lewis Stout, and James Bishop. The capital stock was at first placed at $60,000, but is now increased to $200,000. J. P. Langdon has been made superintendent since 1854. There were then but one or two other factories in America and none in England. Afterwards English works were started, the export trade stopped, and other works were established. In 1865 the rear four-story brick building, one hundred and twelve by forty feet, was erected, owing to the great increase of production. For the first ten years shoes were all plain rubber and sandals; boots began to be made in 1853, and "Arctics" not till about 1866. If it were not for the tariff of thirty per cent., there would be no production in America at all. The English make shoes at a cost of four or five cents each, while here they cost from twelve to fourteen. The caoutchouc in its raw state is received from South America. The sap from the trees is dipped upon a piece of clay, dried and lightly smoked on the exterior, which prepares it for packing. When cut open the interior is found to be of a light yellow color. These bottles are soaked in hot water, and then placed between two heavy iron cylinders and crushed, bringing out the rubber in clean sheets. This is dried thoroughly, and is then ground by a similar process, the rollers in this case being smooth and hollow, heated by steam. These sheets have to be ground three-quarters of an hour before sufficient smoothness is obtained, and they are then brought to other rollers for mixing, etc. This is only part of the process, but is the mode that all the gum has to undergo before being fit for the purposes of the manufactory. New machinery is being invented and adapted to its further use continually, and the demand for the goods is generally greater than the supply.

BUCKRAM AND MOSQUITO NETTING MANUFACTORIES.—One of the important commercial pursuits of this city is the manufactory of Messrs. D. McNair & Son, a large substantially built brick factory on the corner of Hamilton and Union Streets. For over twenty years Mr. McNair, Sr., has been actively engaged in the manufacturing of buckram, mosquito netting, and light muslin, having a large number of hands employed weaving these materials, which have a continual demand upon the market. The manner of arranging and preparing the threads which are woven in muslin is very interesting to those interested in the mechanism and complications of machinery.

OTHER INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.—To complete the list of the industries or manufactories of New Brunswick not found in the census returns or in the directory, a thorough private census has been necessary to obtain the proper information. A full and reliable report will be found of the numerous companies, as follows: The Consolidated Fruit Jar Company, organized in 1870, with the following officers: President, S. R. Pinckney; Vice-President, H. C. Wisner; Secretary and Treasurer, H. E. Shaffer; Superintendent, M. O'Connor. The present officers are R. W. Booth, president, and A. L. Fisher, secretary. They commenced running under the combined patents of three or four former factories, with a paid-up capital stock of five hundred thousand dollars. Their business has largely increased, orders being received from all over Europe as well as the Southern isles of the sea, where large quantities of fruits are prepared and put up in these jars and sent back to the Northern markets.

The machine-works are three in number, of which one, the National Iron-Works, makes a large proportion of the machinery in this vicinity and all the newly patented powder-making machinery; another, the Empire Machine-Works, makes all the improved knitting-machines made in the world, and a third, the Waldron Machine-Works, is devoted to the manufacture of paper-hanging machinery, being a very important establishment, to which nearly every paper-hanging factory in the United States pays tribute.

The rubber business is very largely represented in three large factories, of which an account has been given. The hosiery, also the carpet company, Star Oil Company, and a white lead manufactory. The paper-hanging manufacture of the city is quite extensive, one old and very large factory being in constant operation, and another having started a few years ago, destined to make a large business of its specialty of French moulding and stripes. The shoe industry has a large representation here, there being four factories, one of which is the largest in the State. The pottery establishment of Mr. A. J. Butler in Burnet Street is quite celebrated in its line of terra-cotta manufacture.

Other industries may be thus enumerated: boat-building, 4; bookbinding, 1; box-making, 2; brewery, 1; carriage, 4; cigar-making, 1; confectionery, 2; corset, 1; foundries, 3; hair-net, 1; lime-kiln, 1; marble-works, 4; printing, 3; sail-making, 1; sash and blind, 2; saw-mill, 1; scouring-mill, 1; slate roofing, 1; soap and candles, 1; spice- and coffee-mills, 1; stair-making, 2; taxidermist, 1; weaving, 6; wine sauces, 1; bakers, cake and cracker, 15; blacksmithing and wheelwrighting, 21; boot and shoemakers and dealers, 42; broom manufacturers, 1; mosquito netting, 1; carpenters and builders, 21; carpet-weavers, 8; cedar cooper, 1; cement, lime, and sand, 2; clothiers and tailors, 19; coal, brick, and stone, 10; corsets, 1; cutlery-grinding, 2; dentists, 4; druggists, 9; dry-goods, 10; dyers, 2; foundries, 2; fruit dealers, 3; fur goods, 4; furniture dealers, 7; groceries, 84; hardware, 4; harness-makers, 7; hats and caps, 6; hides, 3; house and sign painting, 11; jewelers and watchmakers, 8; leather shoe findings, 2; locksmiths, 2; marble-works, 5; masons and builders, 9; mineral waters, 2; oil dealers, 2; picture frame dealers, 2; plumbing and gas-fitting, 8; plow manufactory, 1; pump-factory, 1; roofers, 3; root beer, 5; sail-maker, 1; cigars and tobacco, 29; sewing-machine, 3; ship-yards, 2; small boat-builder, 1; soap-works, 1; stoves, tinware, etc., 13; team towing, 2; teas, coffee, and spices, 3.

The Toy Rifle Company, engaged for a while in the manufacture of newly patented toy guns and pistols, have ceased operations and are getting rid of a stock on hand, but will probably not again start in this city. A specimen of their work was sent to the exhibit at Vienna.

It would be interesting, if it was feasible, to give the prominent industries, the corporate or firm-name, the capital stock, the value of the annual products, the number, sex, and age of hands employed, the aggregate and average wages paid, with other remarks of general interest, giving in sums total statistics and statements which would be valuable; and we hope that some day New Jersey will have a commission similar to that in Massachusetts, whose duty it will be to investigate and publish such valuable contributions to social science.

MOTISHER & SHYERS, SHOE MANUFACTURERS.—This firm were among many others who came out of the strike in 1871, and commenced in that year to do work in manufacturing of shoes upon the co-operative plan, and afterwards Mr. Griggs came in, the firm-name becoming Motisher, Griggs & Co., and later Mr. Griggs withdrew and Mr. Shyers came in as the junior partner, as Motisher & Shyers. It was equipped with all the necessary rolling, splitting, skiving, channeling, the McKay, Howe, and Singer sewing-machines, and about twenty-five persons were employed. New Brunswick at that time promised to become quite celebrated for the extent of her shoe manufacture, leather as well as rubber.

VOSPER & KRAMER, SHOE MANUFACTURERS.—There was a considerable strike in the shoe manufactory in February, 1871, and some of the malcontents failed to return to their old work at the shops. In the excitement which followed six men, among whom were two very intelligent young men, Messrs. Vosper and Kramer, started a shop on the co-operative plan on Burnet Street, near New Street. Full of enthusiasm, they held on for a while, and were doing well, when dissensions arose among them as to the details of management, and the result was that in December of the same year Mr. T. Vosper bought out the concern, and soon after associated with him Mr. T. Kramer. This shoe firm commenced to employ about forty hands, turning out about eight hundred pairs of shoes per week. They did considerable business, when Mr. T. Vosper established a shoe manufactory in Hamilton Street, near Division, in 1879, and is carrying on quite an extensive shoe trade.

THE NEW BRUNSWICK CARPET COMPANY.—This, was once one of the leading industries in the city, but the company closed their works in 1877. They have extensive brick buildings, covering some three acres of ground. They were first established in 1871 for manufacture of tapestry Brussels carpets. Mr. James Short was the general superintendent, and on Water Street near Somerset was erected their first building, some sixty by over two hundred feet. Since 1873 they have finished two other immense buildings, fifty feet by two hundred and fourteen feet, two and half stories; forty-five by eighty-seven feet, three and half stories, besides other smaller buildings. They employed nearly three hundred hands, producing near $1,000,000 worth of goods annually. The president as well as treasurer was Mr. R. N. Woodworth, but at the present time the business has been relinquished.

FRUIT-CANNING INDUSTRY, HOLMES & CO.—The fruit and vegetable canning establishment of

New Brunswick, called The Home Valley Preserving Company, established 1880, capital twenty-five thousand dollars, growers and packers of all kinds of fruits, vegetables, meats, jams, jellies, etc., Benjamin F. Holmes, proprietor, Nos. 7, 9, and 11 Water Street, New Brunswick. The factory, originally the old Raritan Steam-Mills, a brick structure, sixty by forty feet, four stories and basement, built on three lots of ground, and so convenient that their goods can be shipped aboard of the vessels on the river from the fourth story of the factory. They have a fifty horse-power engine and elevators from the basement to the top of building for delivering their goods to each store. They employ nearly two hundred hands during the fruit season and half that number in winter, and from which hundreds of thousands of cans are sent into the markets of our large cities every year, and such is the fact, however, and this industry bids fair to rival any. About two years ago Mr. Benjamin F. Holmes, of Kentucky, a gentleman of vast experience in the fruit business, having been engaged in the enterprise for some years in New York, came through this section of the country in search of a proper location for a manufactory of this description. In prospecting about the State he came upon a spot which for natural advantages could not be equaled in another county. The farm on which stand the various buildings comprising the works is situated about three miles from the Pennsylvania Railroad in this city, and here he commenced this business, and now, in the spring of 1882, he has also secured the Raritan Steam-Mills of this city, increasing his business double, and the apparent cleanliness with which the masses of fruits and vegetables are handled preparatory to sealing the same for the shipping department is worthy of notice.

All the cans are manufactured upon the place. Appliances in machinery are abundant. Large quantities of tin are purchased. The pig lead prepared running into moulds one foot length, three-cornered in shape, and about a third of an inch in thickness. The moulds are then carried to the solder-cutter, manipulated by a girl, when they are cut into "drops," three of which are necessary to put the can together, and enough drops can be cut by her in one day to make twenty thousand cans.

In the shearing- or cutting-machine the body of the can is cut from the sheet-tin, hundreds of cases of which are consumed weekly, and a boy at this machine will cut out the bodies of ten thousand cans in ten hours. The same boy, while stationed at a combination die and stamping-machine, cuts out the tops and bottoms for a like number of cans in one-half the time. Next in detail is the capping-machines. These stamp out the little cap for the cans, and one drop of solder is sufficient to place the cap firmly on the can. Considerable dissatisfaction has heretofore arisen regarding the soldering of cans on the inside, which left particles of lead in the preserves, but by the Holmes method this is happily done away with. The six females have soldered seven thousand two hundred cans in one day. There are three sizes,—Nos. 2, 3, and 4, or pint- and quart- and gallon-cans. They are thoroughly washed, passed to the fillers, and when filled they are carefully wiped and sent to the cappers, who finish four thousand cans daily. The caps are soldered on in a neat manner.

At the Home Valley Farm there are nearly two hundred acres in a high state of cultivation, and in a measure supplies a great deal of the fruit and vegetables for the works, besides some three hundred or more acres in the immediate vicinity are now in cultivation under contract, and a fair price being paid for every fruit or vegetable which finds its way hither. The business increasing from a shipment of two hundred thousand cans in 1880 now increased to some six hundred thousand cans, comprising fruits—apples, pears, peaches, the varieties of plums and grapes, strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, cherries, gooseberries, blueberries, etc.—and vegetables,—corn, asparagus, peas, tomatoes, pumpkin, squash, beans, string and lima, etc.; also preserve poultry, beef, and mutton, and manufacture jams and jellies.

SASH AND BLIND FACTORY.—Mr. A. J. Butler is one of the leading manufacturers of sash and blinds. This business was established in 1856, and is situated in John Street, foot of Morris Street. They turn out a large amount of work during the year, much of which is ordered outside of this city. Mr. George Butler is the head manager.

MACHINE-WORKS (WALDRON'S).—One of the largest machinery works was established by William Waldron in the year 1848. It has been engaged largely in the building of machinery for the manufacture of paper-hangings, this being one of the important branches of business in this city. The Waldrons have exported some of these machines to Europe. The present proprietor, John Waldron, is manufacturing a large amount of machines at their brick building, No. 31 Dennis Street.

JOHN BOUNDEY, SHOE MANUFACTORY.—It was about 1861 or 1862 that machines for making shoes began to displace hand-sewed work, and since that time the whole character of the business has changed. So far from the labor-saving machines tending to drive out operatives, they appear, in this trade at least, to call them in, and machines come to be not only labor-saving but labor-creating. Mr. John Bondey started first in the old court-house, moved subsequently to where the Fredonian office now is in Dennis Street, and later still, in 1866, removed to Bayard Street. He employs some fifty or more hands, and supplies the New York and other markets. He has a large amount of machinery for cutting and sewing, besides trimming-machines, etc. The McKay machine carries upon it a meter, which registers every stitch, and by inspection its agents can discover the average number of stitches in a pair of shoes. The factory is on Spring Street, near Albany Street.

MANUFACTURERS OF PAPER-HANGINGS, JANEWAY & Co.—Since the death of William R. Janeway this firm comprises the following gentlemen, under the firm-name of Janeway & Co.: Henry L. Janeway, Frank L. Janeway, and William R. Janeway.

KILPATRICK SHOE MANUFACTORY.—In the year 1877, Frank E. and James T. Kilpatrick, forming the firm of Kilpatrick & Co., manufacturers of leather shoes. Their large brick factory on the corner of Neilson and Hamilton Streets. This building, sixty by one hundred and two feet, four stories high, with engine-room, thirty horse-power, has all the appliances and improvements for manufacturing of medium class, of good solid leather throughout, and no other material used but leather. Women's, misses, and children's grain, pebble, goat, and kid, and men's, youths', and boys'; a calf and fine calf splits. They have an extensive home trade East and South, a business amounting to $350,000 per annum.

THE NEW BRUNSWICK CARPET COMPANY.—Among the industries of this city, established in 1871, was the New Brunswick Carpet Company, and for a number of years or until 1877 carried on an extensive manufactory of Brussels carpets. Immense brick factories, covering some three acres of ground, on Water Street and Somerset Streets. They extended their business to nearly a million dollars, employing a large number of skilled workmen. The process of manufacture of tapestry Brussels was not only a curious and intricate process. They also manufacture seamless druggets, crum-cloths. The superintendent, Mr. James Short, came from England and designed much of this machinery, which descriptions were published in the Scientific American, and were copied into the English papers at that time.

CONSOLIDATED FRUIT-JAR COMPANY, NEW BRUNSWICK.—Sole proprietors and manufacturers of the Mason fruit-jar trimmings, Boyd's and Chace's oilers, can-screws, and general metal goods. R. W. Booth, president; A. L. Fisher, secretary; Jacob Smith, Jr., treasurer. These factories are situated near the railroad bridge and canal office, in Water Street near Railroad. Running under the combined patents of three or four former factories, with a paid-up capital stock of five hundred thousand dollars. They established themselves about the year 1870.

RARITAN SOAP-WORKS.—For more than a century has this branch of the industry of New Brunswick been established, and in that time has had a number of proprietors. Among the chief have been B. V. Ackerman, who for a number of years made the bar soap which found a ready sale all over the country, and since then John Belcher became proprietor, but in 1880 the works were sold to the present firm of Max Lederer and Michael McKenna. They employ some twenty workmen.

THE EMPIRE MACHINE-WORKS.—The hosiery company must be credited with bringing to New Brunswick, besides their own factory, the important machine-shops of G. B. Munn & Co., called the Empire. Mr. Munn in 1856 was closeted with his townsman, Mr. E. E. Kilbourn, in Norfolk, Conn., in working out the latter's new ideas with reference to improving knitting-machines. After a year and a half of secret toil, the Messrs. Kilbourn developed and patented these machines, and the Norfolk company was founded. Mr. Munn was engaged to construct the machinery for the factory. This he continued up to the time of the war, when for two years he engaged in the manufacture of guns. At the close of the conflict he began work for the hosiery company, which had meanwhile been reincorporated as the Norfolk and New Brunswick Company and located in this city. He came here in 1867 and formed a partnership with his old fellow-laborer, E. E. Kilbourn, under the firm-name of G. B. Munn & Co. One year thereafter Mr. Johnson Letson, Mr. L. P. Porter, and Mr. Kilbourn joined with him in the formation of the New Brunswick Machine Company, which continued operations for two years, being succeeded by Mr. Munn alone in 1872, and in July of the same year the firm again changed to G. B. Munn & Co., and so remained until now. Mr. George B. Munn has become the proprietor, situated at No. 13 Water Street, near Albany Street. They have nearly fifty men employed. The works have been somewhat enlarged since they began operation, and will be steadily extended and improved as the amount of business increases. A large amount of their knitting-machines not only supplied the hosiery factory here, but for other factories in other places and States.

THE NATIONAL IRON-WORKS.—They were established by Elijah Kelly in 1847. About nine lots were secured on New Neilson, Morris, and John Streets. He carried on this important and extensive manufactory, and gradually enlarging it, until Jan. 1, 1870, when he sold out to his son, William E. Kelly, who changed the name from the Eagle Foundry and Machine-Works to the National Iron-Works. Under the new energetic management the works have gone on enlarging and increasing in efficiency, until now with a large force of men nearly five hundred tons of pig iron are used up during the year.

The works are particularly adapted to making heavy machinery, and for years have made a specialty of rubber-goods machinery, such as that used in the manufacture of rubber boots and shoes, belting, packing-hose, car-springs, etc., and hard rubber. They now manufacture a great proportion of the machinery for the United States, nearly every rubber factory in the country containing some of their production; besides which they make all the machinery for the New Jersey brick-yards, and besides numerous other machinery for manufacturing purposes in this city and distant places. As a specimen of what they do in the National Iron-Works, they have turned out as many as fifty thousand pieces used in the manufacture of sewing-machines, and as a specimen of their heavy castings we may mention a rubber-machine weighing forty thousand pounds, and a powder-machine weighing sixty thousand pounds, which we saw under way in our visits to the works. The works are heated by steam, lighted with gas, supplied with city water, and well sewered, while the protection against fire is well-nigh perfect. Hose is ready in every part of the works with attachment pipes near, while pipes are laid throughout the building, so that any floor can be flooded in a few minutes by merely pulling a wire on the bottom floor, giving a great advantage in case a fire should gain headway up-stairs before discovery. And such is a brief account of one of our largest manufactories, whose machines supply many of our city factories, may be found in most of the rubber factories in the United States, and have been sent to Montreal, London, Manchester, Edinburgh, St. Petersburg, and to cities in France, South America, and Panama.

CARRIAGE MANUFACTORY.—At the head of the industries for antiquity stands the carriage manufactory of Lyle Van Nuis. In the year 1810–11 his father, John Van Nuis, but recently deceased, having learned his trade of a Mr. Rowland (grandfather of William Rowland, Esq.), at his place on the corner of Richmond and Dennis Streets, left the paternal mansion on Livingston Avenue, the Van Nuis farm, against his conservative parent's advice, and built a carriage-factory on Albany Street. It consisted of several frame buildings ranged around a quadrangle on the south side of thoroughfare; the woodwork, blacksmithing, trimming, and painting each having a separate building, while in front there was a large building used as the repository for finished work. This carriage-house in 1839, upon the removal of the factory, was remodeled into the present substantial residence, and Mr. Van Nuis afterwards erected the other two houses next it. After the establishment of the factory Mr. Van Nuis joined the late Col. Scott's light infantry in the war of 1812, and the business was carried on by a partner. Upon his return in 1813 many of his carriages were sent to the South, and the name of Van Nuis carriages in 1840 was in general repute all over the Southern States. Soon after the three sons, Lyle, Robert, and James, joined with their father under the name of Van Nuis & Sons. Later the firm became L. J. & R. Van Nuis, then J. R. & J. Van Nuis, then L. & J. Van Nuis, and since 1867, Lyle Van Nuis alone, James having died in 1867.

This reputation of thorough excellence has been borne down to the present, and among the fine assortment of exceedingly handsome carriages on hand now not one inferior one can be found. The factory of Lyle Van Nuis, Nos. 33 and 35 Washington Street, can be confidently recommended as one not surpassed in the reputation and quality of its work, nor in the length of its term of favor, by any State or county.

SASH AND BLIND FACTORY.—The sash and blind factory of William S. Van Doren, situated midway between Morris and Somerset Streets, on Neilson Street near Oliver Street, is nearly a score of years old, having been started by William Wright about the year 1852. After ten years' operations Mr. Van Doren succeeded him, the date being 1866, and for the six years following he has gone on enlarging his works and increasing their capacity to double what it was when he took charge of them. November, 1872, he received a serious check by a fire which burned through half his premises, yet he pluckily had the factory in operation again within a month, and it has since been running. The business includes lumber-dressing, sawing, turning, moulding, and sash and blind making. Mr. Van Doren, previous to his beginning the business, had more than fifteen years' experience in the carpenter trade, and is therefore ready to give plans and advice to all who propose building, as well as to prepare the materials. Over two hundred thousand feet of lumber is used, coming in the rough, and go out finished for building and ornamentation.

THE MANUFACTURE OF SHOES.—There is in this city the largest shoe manufactory in the State of New Jersey, that of Felter & Co. The senior member of this firm started business as long ago as 1856, in a shop at the head of Delevan Street, employing two hands in the making of hand-sewed shoes. Gradually enlarging each time, the factory was located successively in the old court-house, corner of Neilson and Bayard Streets. Their present factory is situated in Bayard Street, between Neilson and George Streets. They employ over three hundred hands, and nearly half are females.

From an interesting article published some few years ago the following account is taken: At this time they turned out over five thousand pairs of boots and shoes each week, including men's and boys' boots and shoes, and ladies', misses', and children's shoes, sewed and nailed, the yearly value of the production being about four hundred thousand dollars. The factory at this time was divided into four departments, the bottom stock and cutting-room, the upper stock and cutting-room, the upper fitting-room, and the buttoning- or making-room. In the first the rough sole leather is cut into strips as wide as the shoe is to be long, and then passed under a knife which renders the strips of uniform thickness and body; next these are passed between heavy iron rollers, which take the place of the shoemaker's hammer and lapstone and give solidity to the leather. These strips are then cut into separate inside and outside soles by a die-machine, the die being in sizes, and the leather being reversed as it is fed to them, in order to get rights and lefts. The edges of the sole are then "feathered," or made sharp, and the "shanks" or in-steps are cut away. The soles are next pressed in a mould to give the bulging shape of the human foot, and the outsoles are channeled and grooved ready for stitching. Thus before the sole alone is ready for the upper it is handled by a dozen different men. The heel lifts are cut out by hand-dies in the same room and tacked together ready to be shaped into heels, and the "counters" or stiff leather heel linings are also cut.

The next department is where the uppers are cut from morocco and other leathers by hand, according to brass-bound pasteboard patterns, which change in style twice a year. The uppers are cut by hand, because it is found that no machine can by automatic motion take the place of the judgment which requires to be exercised in order to save material. These patterns are for "quarters," or the part of the shoe which incloses the instep and ankle. "Vamps," or fore uppers, linings to correspond, trimmings and bindings, and various little pieces to be fitted over seams, and to be used in various parts as the shoe is put together,—all these are gathered in bundles, labeled according to their size and the case in which they are placed, and rolled in boxes across to the third department in the northern building. Here are nearly one hundred sewing-machines of the Howe and other patents, guided by girls and run by steam-power. Each girl has a special line of work to do, some sewing together the backs, or "closing" them, some sewing on the flies, some sewing the button-holes, etc. The flies of the button shoes are cut for the button-holes, the holes sewed around by machine, and underbraided or strengthened by a stay of strong thread, and the buttons sewed on by hand. For the ordinary balmoral or "Polish" shoe, the eyelet holes are cut by one machine and the metal eyes put in by another, when the backs are sewed together and the other parts ready to be fitted. They are pasted together so as to be properly held for the operation of sewing, the pasting corresponding to the basting of tailors' patterns. After the paste has dried in rooms devoted to that purpose the parts are stitched together, and the now completed uppers go to the fourth department to be joined to the bottoms. First they are placed over an iron-plated last and tacked by hand to the inner sole, then they are taken to the cable-screw-wire-tacking-on-machine, which fastens the outside sole to the upper preparatory to sewing. This machine cuts and drives tacks from coils of wire fed to it. Thus prepared the lasts are removed and sewing-machines are brought into use which in a short space of time securely sews on a sole to an upper. Then "the channels" which were made for the stitching are pasted and laid by the American beating-out machine, and the shoes are re-lasted. Next the edges and shanks are trimmed and blacked by hand and burnished by machine. The heels are nailed on and then trimmed by hand by the Joyce machine, and also blacked and burnished, the soles being shaved off with sand-paper; the finishing blacking is laid on and burnished and the process is complete. The large amount of stock turned out every week by Felter & Co. is shipped to New York, where it is sold to jobbers, the firm keeping no warehouse, and the articles it puts on sale bear a high reputation with the trade.

Banks.—The first bank organized in the city was THE BANK OF NEW BRUNSWICK, locally known as Hardenbergh's Bank. It was founded by Jacob R. Hardenbergh and others in 1807, and did business till about 1834, when it was suspended. Mr. Hardenbergh, the president of this bank, was an active business man and member of the bar of Middlesex County, to which the reader is referred for a fuller sketch. Martin A. Howell was one of the directors in this bank, as he has also been in all the banks which have had an existence in New Brunswick. The Bank of New Brunswick was located on the corner of George and Paterson Streets.

THE STATE BANK OF NEW BRUNSWICK was chartered by "An Act to Establish State Banks," passed at Trenton Jan. 28, 1812. It also chartered the State Banks of Camden, Trenton, Elizabeth, Newark, and Morris at Morristown. The commissioners named to receive subscriptions to stock in New Brunswick were Squire Martin, Robert Lee, Asa Runyon, Bernard Smith, and Henry V. Low. The directors named in the charter were Robert Lee, Bernard Smith, Phineas Carman, Henry V. Low, John Outcalt, John Bray, Jonathan Hutchings, Jonathan Squire, John Brewster, Daniel Perrine, Robert McChesney, Jacob Snyder, Jacob Van Winckle.

Daniel W. Disbrow was the first cashier. The presidents have been as follows: Charles Smith, F. R. Smith, John B. Hill, John R. Ford, and Abraham Voorhees.

This bank did business in the old State Bank building on the corner of Peace and Albany Streets, erected about 1820.

The State Bank of New Brunswick failed Sept. 13, 1873. It paid all its liabilities, and was resuscitated in October following by means of contributions from the stockholders and friends of the bank to the amount of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, all of which was paid in excepting about five thousand dollars, which was not collected in consequence of the donor being unable to pay his subscription. It failed the second time March 31, 1877, and was placed in the hands of Col. John W. Newell as receiver.

PETER SPADER was born in Somerset County, N. J., about half a mile from Middlebush Church, on Thursday, 29th September, 1785, the only son and child of John Spader and his second wife, Jane Vanderbilt. His ancestors came from Holland. The first records we find of them are deeds and leases (now in possession of Peter Vanderbilt Spader) in the purchase by Johannes Spader of one hundred and ninety-six acres of land on the Millstone River of Samuel Royse on Sept. 20, 1718, and two leases, one of two hundred and ten acres in 1722, and the other of nine hundred and eighty acres in 1730, from Clem. Plumstead, the heir of one of the original East Jersey proprietors. This Johannes Spader was the great-grandfather of Peter Spader.

The next record we have is when Lord Howe's army was retreating from Millstone to New Brunswick in 1777; the barn and outbuildings and part of the house of John Spader, father of Peter Spader, were destroyed by fire by the British army.

Peter Spader left his home at the age of twelve years and came to New Brunswick, where he obtained employment as a clerk with John Bray, one of the leading merchants of New Brunswick, with whom he remained until 1805. At that date he commenced a general mercantile business for himself in a building (now removed) at about No. 20 Albany Street. Here he remained until 1816, when he bought the lot on the northwest corner of George and Church Streets, where he erected the building now owned and occupied by his son, Peter Vanderbilt Spader, and carried on the same business until 1830. On June 14, 1820, he married Nelly Voorhees Quick, daughter of Tunis Quick and Aletta Van Doren Voorhees.

Tunis Quick, a farmer, miller, and large landowner, lived near Flemington, Hunterdon Co., and was the son of Col. Abraham Quick, of Somerset County, who was the colonel of Second Battalion of Somerset County militia during the Revolutionary war.

In the spring of 1830, Peter Spader was elected cashier of the "State Bank at New Brunswick," and, from his well-known reputation and large business acquaintance with the people of Hunterdon, Somerset, and Middlesex Counties, was largely instrumental in building up the standing and prosperity of the bank. Dr. McDowell, of Somerset County, in an article published in Our Home in May, 1873, says, "We had no bank in the county (Somerset), and were all delighted when we saw an old 'State Bank at New Brunswick' note with Peter Spader's name to it." He resigned his position as cashier of the bank in the spring of 1841, and retired wholly from business, excepting to manage several estates of which he was trustee or executor, and to hold the treasurership of the First Reformed Dutch Church, and of Rutgers College, each of which he held for thirty years. The only public offices he ever held were alderman of the city and freholder for the county. He died on Sept. 9, 1855, aged sixty-nine years, eleven months, and ten days, leaving a widow, who survived him until April 1, 1873, aged eighty-five years, seven months, and nine days. He left two sons. The elder, James Voorhees Spader, born on Oct. 2, 1825, died Nov. 12, 1871, aged forty-six years, one month, and ten days. The younger, Peter Vanderbilt Spader, born Dec. 1, 1829, resides in the house his father built, and in which he (the son) was born. With truth it may be said of Peter Spader he left the name of an honest man,—

"A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod,
An honest man's the noblest work of God."

ABRAHAM VORHEES.—Steven Coerte, or Coerten, the common ancestor of the Voorhees or Van Voorhees family of Long Island and New Jersey, emigrated with his family from Reinen, Dreuthe, in the Netherlands, in April, 1660. This family by old letters can be traced back one generation in the Fatherland, and, like most of the early settlers, had no proper surname, adopting as such the name of the village or locality from whence they emigrated. Minne Van Voorhees, son of the emigrant, born in Flatlands, L. I., married, April 25, 1717, Antie, daughter of Garret Pieterse Wyckoff, removing to New Brunswick, N. J., the same year. He afterwards married Lemitje Stryker, widow of Jacob Wyckoff, of Six-Mile Run. Three of his brothers came to New Jersey with him, viz.: John, Roeloff, and Albert, and also two sisters, Catrinche and Wellentje. From these have sprung a numerous family, whose descendants are settled largely in Hunterdon, Somerset, and Middlesex Counties, N. J., and members of this family are found among the most substantial business men, and prominent in the professions and legislation of the State and country.

Albert Voorhees, recently a judge of the Court of Appeals and also Lieutenant-Governor of Louisiana, traces his ancestry to Middlesex County, N. J., and Daniel W., United States Senator from Indiana, is the great-grandson of Stephen of New Jersey. A detailed history of the Voorhees family may be found in the history of Hunterdon and Somerset Counties. The paternal grandfather of our subject was Lucas L. Voorhees, and his maternal grandfather, Isaac I. Voorhees, both residents of Somerset County, near Millstone, who reared large families of children. Isaac L., father of Abraham Voorhees, married Abigail, daughter of Isaac I. Voorhees, who bore him the following children: Lucas, John, Abraham, Isaac, Peter, William, Sarah Ann (wife of Cornelius Gulick), Jane (wife of William Williamson), Joanna (wife of Garret Garretson), Matilda (second wife of Garret Garretson), Emma (wife of John Garretson), and Maria (wife of Jacob Veghte), all of whom settled in the vicinity of their birth after their marriages. Isaac L. Voorhees was a farmer by occupation, and resided near Six-Mile Run, in Franklin township, Somerset County. He was much interested in church matters, and reared his family under the influences of the Reformed Dutch Church at Six-Mile Run, now Franklin Park, in which he served as preacher for over thirty years.

Abraham Voorhees was born near Millstone, Somerset Co., N. J., Sept. 18, 1817, and spent his boyhood in the routine of attending the district school and on the farm. At the age of fourteen he went to Morristown, N. J., and for four years was an apprentice in learning the trade of a silversmith. In 1835 he came to New Brunswick, and established himself in the watch and jewelry business, which he carried on successfully for twenty-five years, during which time he became identified with very many of the local enterprises of the city, and has ever taken an active part in church, school, and kindred interests.

Upon the failure of the State Bank in New Brunswick in 1873, Mr. Voorhees was the first one to make a move to resuscitate the bank, an institution which had stood for sixty years, and he contributed liberally, giving twenty-six thousand dollars towards this object.

At the alumni dinner the year before the centennial celebration of Rutgers College, in 1870, Mr. Voorhees was the largest donor to the centennial fund, and President Campbell, in referring to the matter in an address delivered on that occasion, said, "The work in reality began last year at the alumni dinner, when Mr. Abraham Voorhees, of this city, presented a property worth ten thousand dollars to the college. That gift was the first fruit, and for all time Mr. Voorhees has the honor of being the first subscriber to the centennial fund." The continuation of this subscription by others raised a fund of one hundred and five thousand dollars.

Abraham Voorhees was baptized by Rev. James S. Cannon upon the occasion of the first sermon preached in the Reformed Church at Franklin Park after its erection, and from early manhood has been engaged in Sunday-school and church work. For twenty-nine years he was superintendent of the First Presbyterian Church Sunday-school in New Brunswick, and energetic and faithful in the discharge of his duties, always entering upon and continuing his services with fervor, zeal, and earnestness. In connection with the same church he is one of its ruling elders. His first wife was Jane, daughter of Jesse Jarvis, of Rye, N. Y., who died April 8, 1875, leaving one surviving child, Willard Penfield Voorhees, who graduated at Rutgers College, studied law with Judge Woodbridge Strong, of New Brunswick, and is practicing his profession in that city. His present wife is Mattie J., daughter of John Van Nostrand, of New Brunswick, by whom he has two children,—Howard Crosby and Florence Eliot.

THE FARMERS' AND MECHANICS' BANK OF NEW BRUNSWICK was incorporated by act of the Legislature passed Feb. 26, 1834. Its first president was James F. Randolph, who was succeeded by Charles Dunham, and he by Abraham Suydam. Lewis Carman was the first cashier. This bank first did business where the post-office is now situated, on Barnet Street, and subsequently removed to Church Street, where it remained until its suspension.

THE BANK OF NEW JERSEY was chartered Feb. 24, 1837, John Van Dyke, president; Moses F. Webb, cashier. It was changed into the National Bank of New Jersey in 1864. THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEW BRUNSWICK, which had been previously organized with a capital of $100,000, and which did business under the presidency of Israel H. Hutchings, was, about 1870, merged with the State Bank, and became obsolete in that institution. Nov. 22, 1864, the Bank of New Jersey was reorganized as THE NATIONAL BANK OF NEW JERSEY, with a capital of $250,000, and is the bank now doing business in the city. It was organized with the following directors: Andrew Agnew, Isaac Fisher, John B. Hill, Lewis T. Howell, Isaac L. Martin, Simeon W. Phillips, Garret I. Sneker, Garret G. Voorhees, and Peter A. Voorhees.

The fine banking building is situated on the corner of Church and Neilson Streets. The following are

John Belton

JOHN B. HILL, son of Thomas Hill, was descended from a highly respectable English family that settled in New Brunswick when it was in its infancy. While yet a mere youth John B. Hill entered the office of Col. James Neilson in the capacity of a clerk. Mr. Neilson was at that time treasurer of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and young Hill was afforded an excellent opportunity to become familiar with the various details of an extensive business. After serving them for some time he accepted the position of book-keeper in the State Bank in New Brunswick, where he entered upon his duties Oct. 3, 1835. In that capacity he served faithfully and to the satisfaction of both the public and the officers of the institution, until 1841, when he was promoted to the responsible position of cashier of the bank. In this position he won golden opinions and high laudations in recognition of his close attention to business, uncompromising integrity, and great urbanity. On Nov. 1, 1852, he was elected president of the bank, and under his administration the bank met with almost unprecedented prosperity, and its name for reliability became second to no bank in the State. He held this position until Feb. 1, 1864, when he resigned his official place as president, and soon after accepted the presidency of the National Bank of New Jersey, a position which he held until his decease, Feb. 28, 1874, being then in his sixty-ninth year. Mr. Hill was a modest and unassuming man, and never sought political place or the emoluments of office, yet he served the city as mayor for one term prior to the war, and during his term of office sought to introduce certain improvements which, had the people co-operated with him, would have greatly enhanced the prosperity of the city. He was a candidate for State senator, but his party being greatly in the minority he was defeated. He was a warm supporter of the Union during the late civil war. His patriotism was strong and uncompromising, and he made many personal sacrifices in behalf of the soldiers in the field. His wife, Henrietta B. Chapman, of Holmesburg, Pa., died a few years before him. Their children are T. Wilton Hill, cashier of the First National Bank of Jamesburg, N. J.; John T. Hill, president of the Ninth National Bank of New York; Charles S. Hill, cashier of the National Bank of New Jersey at New Brunswick, and serving his second term as county clerk of Middlesex; Edward Hill, discount clerk of the Ninth National Bank of New York; and Sarah C. Hill.

"At a special meeting of the board of directors of the National Bank of New Jersey, held on the second day of March, 1874, it was resolved and declared—"That this board of directors are deeply impressed with the loss of this institution in the death of our beloved and honored president, John B. Hill, whose wise forecast, sound judgment, unswerving rectitude of heart and life, and conscientious devotion to duty established him firmly in public confidence, and contributed largely to the prosperity and usefulness of this bank.

"That in a wider sphere of duty the community in which he lived so long and honorably will miss and mourn him as a sagacious and valuable associate in the administration of public affairs.

"That we bear testimony to his uniform gentleness, courtesy, forbearance, charity, and liberality, and that personally to each of us his memory will ever be that of a friend, trusted and honored, who bore to the end of his long and useful life a conscience void of offense, and of whom, at the close of his earthly record, we confidently say, 'Behold the honest man, the noblest work of God.'

"That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of the deceased; that they also be published in the newspapers of this city, and that this banking-house be suitably draped in mourning.

"That we meet at the banking-house at eleven o'clock A.M. on Tuesday, March 3d, for the purpose of attending the funeral in a body.

MAHLON RUNYON.—The homestead of this branch of the Runyon family has been in the township of Piscataway, Middlesex Co., N. J., for a century and a half, and the progenitor of the family in this country is supposed to have been among the French refugees who fled their country following the revocation of the famous Edict of Nantes in 1685, whereby so many Protestants were driven to Holland, and thence to the New World.

John Runyon, a native of Piscataway, and a carpenter and farmer by occupation, resided in that township during his active business life. His wife, Christiana Stelle, bore him three sons,—Abel S., father of our subject; Ephraim, a farmer in his native township during his life; and Clarkson, who was for many years a merchant in New Brunswick, and subsequently a manufacturer of rubber goods both in New Brunswick and Newark, N. J. He died in the former place.

Abel S. Runyon, born in Piscataway in 1795, died there in 1875. His first wife was Catherine, daughter of Jeremiah Manning, of the same place, whose ancestors were old settlers of the township. She died in 1826, leaving two surviving children,—John, of Piscataway, and Mahlon.

Abel S. Runyon was a farmer and carpenter. He purchased a part of the Manning homestead after his marriage, and there resided most of his life afterwards. He was a man of decided and positive convictions, plain and unostentatious in his ways, and possessed sterling integrity in all of his business relations. He never sought political place among his fellow-townsmen, and never held office except to fill some minor offices in his township, although he was always interested in local matters and somewhat active in promoting measures tending to the best interests of his political party and the election of honest men to official place. He was a contributor to and promoter of religious work in the community where he resided, and for many years a member of the First Baptist Church of Piscataway. For his second wife he married Mercy, daughter of Reune Runyon, of the same place, who died in 1841, leaving the following children: Catherine A., widow of Henry Branting-ham, who was killed at the battle of Fredericksburg in the late civil war; Julia A., wife of George Drake, of Piscataway; Adeline, wife of George Heath, of Tarrytown, N. Y.; and Mercey, wife of Lewis Walker, of Piscataway.

Mahlon, son of Abel S. Runyon and Catherine Manning, was born March 29, 1824. His boyhood was spent in the routine of farm-work and attending school during the winter months. At the age of sixteen he came to New Brunswick and became a clerk in the store of his uncle, Clarkson Runyon, with whom he remained one year, when, his uncle selling out his goods, he remained in the same store for two years more. In 1843 he established mercantile business in New Brunswick on his own account, which he successfully carried on until 1856. For eleven years following he was a grain merchant here, and in 1867 he purchased a country residence in his native township on the Raritan River, which he has improved and made one of the most desirable outside of the city, and which he has kept as his family homestead since. Since his first coming to New Brunswick Mr. Runyon has been interested in the various enterprises of the place and a contributor to its worthy local objects. He was elected a director of the National Bank of New Jersey at New Brunswick on May 7, 1867, and succeeded Mr. James Dayton as its president on Dec. 7, 1875, which position he fills in 1882.

Mr. Runyon was united in marriage in 1848 to Susan, daughter of Judge Peter P. Runyon, of New Brunswick, who was alderman and recorder of the city for several years, justice of the peace, and for thirteen years served as judge of the Court of Common Pleas. He was one of the most zealous and influential members of the Baptist Church in the State, a Sunday-school worker and superintendent for many years of his life, and from 1830 until his death in 1871, at the age of eighty-four, treasurer of the Baptist State Convention.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Mahlon Runyon are Mary, wife of F. R. Stout, of New Brunswick; Charles H., a lawyer of the same place; Deborah A., wife of Dr. Samuel Long, of New Brunswick; and Lillie A.

NEW BRUNSWICK SAVINGS INSTITUTION.—This savings institution was incorporated March 15, 1851, by an act of the Legislature that Littleton Kirkpatrick, John Acken, Peter Spader, James Parker, John W. Stout, David F. Randolph, Peter Conover, William Dunham, John R. Ford, Charles D. Deshler, Robert Adrain, Moses F. Webb, Theodore G. Neilson, David Bishop, Peter V. Miller, William Boylan, and their successors shall be and are hereby constituted a body corporate and politic by the name of "The New Brunswick Savings Institution," and by that name shall be capable of purchasing, taking, holding, and enjoying to them and their successors any real estate in fee simple or otherwise, etc. Their banking-house is No. 17 Albany Street. President, Garret G.

Voorhees; Vice-President, Clifford Morrogh, M.D.; Secretary and Treasurer, Neilson Dunham; Managers, Theodore G. Neilson, Henry H. Palmer, Clifford Morrogh, M.D., Lewis T. Howell, Henry L. Janeway, Daniel M. Vail, Garret G. Voorhees, Azariah D. Newell, M.D., William Rust, Andrew Agnew, Abraham Voorhees, William H. Acken, Gustavus Auten, John T. Hill.

DIME SAVINGS-BANK.—An act to incorporate the Dime Savings-Bank of the city of New Brunswick, N. J., approved Feb. 7, 1871: Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, that Levi D. Jarrad, Lyle Van Nuis, A. V. Schenck, Henry De Hart, Henry K. How, Garret G. Voorhees, Jehiel K. Hoyt, Robert G. Miller, Peter I. Stryker, Uriah De Hart, John V. H. Van Cleepe, Henry N. Marsh, Adrain Vermuele, George C. Ludlow, Amos Robins, Joseph L. Mulford, Jacob E. Stout, Garret Conover, John M. Connell, Miles Ross, and their successors shall be and are hereby constituted a body corporate and politic by the name of "The Dime Savings-Bank" of the city of New Brunswick. Their place of banking business is situated at 137 George Street. Open daily from 9 A.M. to 1 P.M. and from 2 to 4 P.M., and on Monday evening from seven to eight o'clock. Deposits received from ten cents upwards, and interest allowed on deposits from the first of every month, and the interest credited on the second Tuesday of January and July. Lyle Van Nuis, president; Arthur G. Ogilby, secretary and treasurer; John Wycoff, assistant secretary; Board of Managers, Lyle Van Nuis, Henry R. Baldwin, Willard P. Voorhees, James P. Langdon, Adrain Vermuele, Runyon R. Outcalt, Robert J. Hannah.

New Brunswick Gaslight Company.—About the year 1850, our city having about ten thousand inhabitants, was looked upon as a proper place for the introduction of gas, and a company was formed and chartered, the majority of whose corporators were residents of other places. They had estimates made, but these were so large that the company relinquished their franchises, and in 1851 the following residents were authorized by legislative charter: John W. Stout, E. M. Patterson, Peter Spader, David Bishop, Benjamin D. Steele, and Moses F. Webb, and in the same year the company organized with the following officers: President, John W. Stout; Secretary, Superintendent, and Engineer, John G. Hall; Treasurer, Jonathan C. Ackerman; Board of Directors, J. W. Stout, J. R. Ford, J. C. Ackerman, M. A. Howell, and David Bishop.

The erection of the works was immediately proceeded with, and were built at less than half the cost of the estimates of the former company. Since 1868, when Col. J. W. Newell was appointed, and who still retains the position of secretary, treasurer, superintendent, and engineer, the works have been improved beyond recognition. Nearly ten miles of pipes have been laid in the city, and about one hundred thousand dollars have been spent, including the new holder at a cost of fifty thousand dollars, on the corner of Water and Washington Streets, of nearly one hundred and seventy thousand feet capacity, and Col. Newell has brought the company to a very prosperous condition. There are several minor points about the works it is not necessary to mention. It is sufficient to say that with an ample force of twenty or thirty men the works are kept in good condition. The present board of directors are: President, Henry Richmond; Secretary and Superintendent, John W. Newell; Treasurer, Lewis Applegate; Directors, Henry Richmond, Henry L. Janeway, A. B. Newell, Christopher Meyer, Johnson Letson.

Water Supply.—The water for the supply of the city is taken from Lawrence's Brook, at Weston's Mills, southeast of the city limits. The water is raised by two pumps. One is driven by a fifty-four-inch turbine-wheel, and supplies the city from November 1st to June 1st, or during that portion of the season when there is sufficient water to run the wheel. The other is a steam-pump (capacity two million four hundred thousand gallons per twenty-four hours), used when pumping by water is not practicable. The reservoir is located at the head of Comstock Street, two basins, total capacity fourteen million gallons. The works were constructed in 1864. There are at present twenty-two miles of mains. For fire purposes steam fire-engines are employed.

The New Brunswick Water Company transferred their works to the city on April 30, 1873. Since then they have been managed by a board of water commissioners, two of whom are appointed each year to serve for three years.

Present officers: Joseph Fisher, president; Arthur G. Ogilby, secretary; A. J. Jones, treasurer and superintendent.

CHAPTER XCVI.

Educational Institutions.—EARLY PRIVATE SCHOOLS.—Of the early private schools of New Brunswick little is known previous to the year 1800. During the half-century following (1800 to 1850) private schools were taught by Messrs. Charles Poole, Samuel Seymour, Charles Burnham, John G. Tarbell, Charles Spaulding, Luke Egerton, Aaron Slack, Thomas Hobart, Benjamin Mortimer, Miss McLaughlin, Miss Sally Vickers, Mrs. and Miss Bell, Miss Johnson, Abram Ackerman, Samuel Walker, and Prof. David Cole. The foregoing taught boys mostly, though some taught both boys and girls. As teachers of girls exclusively during the same period may be mentioned Miss Hays, Madame McKay, Miss Nancy Drake, Miss Whiting, and Miss Hannah Hoyt.

Lancasterian School.—One of the earliest private schools in the city, which is still in existence, has a semi-public character, and is known as the "Lancasterian." In the last will and testament of Mr. William Hall, made in 1803, after various bequests, he disposed of the remainder of his property "to Thomas Grant and his son Ebenezer, and to the survivors of them, in trust to be expended by them in educating poor children in the City of New Brunswick." Ebenezer Grant declined the trust, which amounted to a little more than four thousand dollars, and obtained an act from the Legislature creating a board of trustees to be composed of two persons of each of the churches then in the city. Under this act the following gentlemen were appointed: John Neilson and Moses Guest, from the Presbyterian Church; James Schureman and Staats Van Deursen, from the Reformed Dutch Church; Robert Boggs and William P. Deare, from the Episcopal Church. This board had its first meeting June 8, 1809, but it was not till April 6, 1814, that the first teacher, Mr. Shepard Johnson, was appointed, at a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars per year and house rent. The building known as the "Queen's College" was removed from where the Second Presbyterian Church now stands to its present site on Schureman Street, and on June 1, 1814, the school was opened with thirty-five free and six pay pupils. The school was conducted for many years on the "Lancasterian or monitorial plan." Many of the oldest citizens of New Brunswick attended this school; one of them who rose to the dignity of monitor gives the following as striking instances of the methods of teaching and discipline in vogue in this famous institution three-quarters of a century ago:

On the form or desk in front of the pupils there was a depression of about six inches in width and a quarter of an inch in depth, filled with sand. When the writing exercise was about to begin the monitor, with a ruler, would stroke the sand as we do a measure of grain, making it smooth. Then each pupil, provided with a stick resembling a butcher's skewer, imitated in the sand the copy placed before him by the monitor. Corporal punishment was inflicted in the following novel manner: A pupil guilty of an offense which merited punishment was called out and forced to mount upon the back of the general monitor, when the principal, with a rattan about three feet in length, administered the penalty—in a striking manner.

Mr. Johnson resigned his position Nov. 20, 1816, and Mr. Henry B. Poole was appointed his successor. The latter resigned June 30, 1818, and was succeeded by Mr. Zenophon T. Maynard, who resigned July 7, 1824. His successor was Mr. Harrison, who retained the position of principal until the close of 1831, and Feb. 25, 1832, Mr. Elihu Cook was appointed to the place. He resigned in 1838, and April 4th of that year the present principal, Mr. A. W. Mayo, was appointed.

At the opening of the Bayard Street school in 1853 this school became so small that it was suspended, and so remained until Dec. 1, 1855, when it was reopened. Mr. Mayo took charge of the school forty-four years ago, and since that time his best energies have been freely given to promote its interests. That he has given satisfaction is abundantly shown by the fact that during the whole period of his service his board of trustees have cheerfully sustained him in every act involved in the discharge of his duties as principal of the school.

Public Schools.¹—The history of the public schools of the city of New Brunswick is embraced in two periods: first, that from April 22, 1851, to May 14, 1855, when the schools were under the control of three trustees; and second, that from May 14, 1855, to the present time, during which the schools have been in charge of twelve gentlemen, who compose the Board of Education.

On April 22, 1851, three gentlemen, Messrs. James Bishop, Henry Sanderson, and Moses F. Webb, met at the house of Mr. Bishop and organized the first board of school trustees in the city of New Brunswick. They elected James Bishop chairman and Henry Sanderson secretary. To this board belongs the credit of inaugurating the public school system of the city. They fought its first battles, and laid its foundations firm and strong. At the first meeting a resolution was passed that the board be incorporated, and that its corporate name be the New Brunswick Public School. May 27th a certificate of incorporation was adopted and ordered to be recorded in the county clerk's office.

Mr. A. W. Mayo, who had been appointed to take the census, reported in the city 1754 children between the ages of five and eighteen years, and that 757 of the same had received instruction during some portion of the year in the various private schools. The following notice was ordered published: "A meeting of the taxable inhabitants of School District No. 1 of the township of North Brunswick will be held at the City Hall on Tuesday evening, June 3, 1851, at eight o'clock, at which time the trustees will ask authority to purchase a lot and erect thereon a suitable building for a public school for said district."

The board met August 18th, and after much consideration of various lots offered for a school site the lot then known as the "old jail lot" was selected. September 5th the board met, and Mr. Jackson was appointed a teacher of a public school to be opened in the First Ward, at a salary of two hundred dollars for six months. This was the first appointment of a teacher of a public school in the city; but Mr. Jackson declined, and September 10th Miss Anna Molleson was chosen to fill the place at a salary of one hundred and twenty-five dollars for six months. October 17th the board adopted the plan of a Brooklyn school building, which with some slight changes constitutes the present Bayard Street school-house. On May 25, 1851, a contract was made with Messrs. J. B. Inslee, P. N. Wyckoff, and Jephth Cheesman to erect the building complete for school purposes for the sum of seven thousand one hundred and ten dollars. Miss Molleson not finding the daily walk of a public school teacher a bed of thornless roses, resigned her position Jan. 26, 1852, receiving the first public money paid for teaching a public school in the city of New Brunswick. She was succeeded by Mr. John Taylor, at a salary of three hundred and fifty dollars a year.

June 2, 1852, a communication was received from Messrs. C. L. Hardenbergh and Judge Terhune, asking that a portion of the public school money be given for the support of the Lancasterian school. This communication showed that the full scope of public instruction was not understood at that time. Many thought public schools were charity schools, pauper schools, and only designed for those who were unable to pay for their own children. They did not understand that the State proposed to give this education for its own benefit; that is, for the benefit of all classes, whether rich or poor, bond or free. The State recognized no sect or class, but gave the opportunity of an education to all. The trustees, understanding the design of the school law, respectfully declined the request for the division of the public money, on the ground that the Lancasterian school was not a public school under the control of the Board.

On Dec. 10, 1852, Mr. Silas S. Bowen, of the State Normal School, was appointed principal of the New Brunswick public school in Bayard Street, at a salary of twelve hundred dollars per year, and on Feb. 15, 1853, the Bayard Street school was opened for pupils. July 8, 1853, Mr. Bowen resigned, and on August 2d Mr. John S. Clark, of Lyons, N. Y., was appointed to fill the vacancy.

On Sept. 1, 1853, the board finding that the Bayard Street building could not accommodate those desiring to attend the public schools, obtained and opened the session rooms of the Presbyterian Church for the reception of pupils. April 20, 1854, the board passed a resolution requiring the teachers to meet every Tuesday evening at the Bayard Street school-house for normal instruction. July 21, 1854, the board resolved to purchase a lot on the "old Trenton road" (now French Street) for $500 for a colored school, and on September 10th they made a contract for the erection of a building for the same for the sum of $1050.

Jan. 13, 1855, Miss McLaury was engaged as assistant in the highest female department, and among her duties she was required to give instruction in drawing and embroidery. Drawing is retained in the school, though embroidery has been discontinued. Jan. 22, 1855, the first public school for colored children was opened, and on the evening of the same day the first night school was established for those who were unable to attend the day school. April 23, 1855, a public exhibition of the schools was held in the Presbyterian Church, and an address was delivered by Rev. Dr. Davidson. This celebration was a fit closing of the first period of public instruction in New Brunswick.

The second period commenced May 14, 1855, when, under the provisions of a special act passed March 3, 1855, the following-named persons were elected the first Board of Education: First Ward, Elias Ross, one year, J. B. McGuiness, two years; Second Ward, Charles Dunham, one year, Henry Sanderson, two years; Third Ward, Randolph Martin, one year, A. D. Newell, two years; Fourth Ward, Moses F. Webb, one year, George Janeway, two years; Fifth Ward, John B. Hill, one year, A. V. Schenck, two years; Sixth Ward, George H. Cook, one year, William J. Thompson, two years.

The board organized by electing Henry Sanderson president, John B. Hill, treasurer, and Dr. Charles Dunham, clerk. On June 1, 1855, they adopted a set of by-laws and rules for the government of the schools, which with some slight modification remain in force till the present time. October 8th complaints from various citizens were reported by the Grievance Committee that their children had been suspended from school because of their failure to get singing-books, in accordance with the regulations of the board. The following resolution, touching the subject, was adopted:

"Resolved, That the principal be authorized to suspend pupils who neglect to procure books or utensils after two days' notice, and report the same immediately to the Committee on Books and Stationery, and if in their opinion the parents or guardians are able to procure the necessary books, such pupils shall remain suspended until the meeting of the board, unless they shall before such meeting report themselves to the principal with such book and utensils."

April 5, 1857, Mr. Clark resigned the principalship, and was succeeded by Mr. Charles S. Wright. Mr. Wright resigned Dec. 23, 1859, giving place to Mr. Mervin Hollister as his successor, who had charge till Dec. 21, 1860, when he resigned on account of ill health, and was succeeded by Mr. Caleb M. Harrison, Jan. 1, 1861.

On June 12th of this year the board purchased a lot on the corner of Carman and Neilson Streets for $750, and Aug. 27, 1862, Mr. Mabey, chairman of the committee, reported that contracts had been awarded to Mr. E. B. Wright for carpenter-work, Mr. John Cheesman for mason-work, and Mr. John Johnson for painting, at an aggregate cost of $3126.

Mr. Harrison resigned the principalship in July, 1864, and was succeeded by Mr. Henry Waters, who resigned Oct. 1, 1865, when the present principal and superintendent, Mr. Henry B. Pierce, took charge of the schools. At the outset of his administration he advocated similar accommodations to those now furnished by the Livingston Avenue building. In 1867 the pupils were thoroughly graded, and a course of study was adopted by the board. In 1872 the lot on Livingston Avenue was purchased, and March 6, 1875, contracts for the erection of the building were made with Messrs. Bessonett & Meagher, mason-work, Mr. E. B. Goltien, carpenter-work, and Mr. Hugh McKeag, steam-heating, plumbing, and gas-fitting, at an aggregate cost of $47,712. The plans were prepared by Mr. Stephen H. De Hart, architect. Early in the spring ground was broken, and the work of laying the foundation commenced May 10th. The building was completed and dedicated as a centennial memorial May 4, 1876, being one of the most auspicious events in the history of public schools in New Brunswick. On that occasion Prof. Pierce read a historical sketch of public schools in New Brunswick, from which the facts have been taken for the present article. In closing he said,—

"This, then, in brief is the history of public instruction in the city of New Brunswick from its inception in 1851 to 1876. In 1851 the first board of trustees was elected and organized. There were one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four children of school age, but no public school, no school property, no building, and no system of instruction. To-day there is a Board of Education, composed of twelve members, two from each ward, who have charge of property worth $150,000, and who have control of forty-one teachers, who give instruction to nearly twenty-five hundred different children during the year. There is also a system of public instruction which embraces a course of study requiring twelve years for its completion, divided equally into primary, grammar, and high school periods. Truly are the children of our city to be envied in their educational advantages, and truly are our citizens to be congratulated in possessing them. As the completion of the Livingston Avenue building ends the second period of public instruction in New Brunswick, its occupants in this our centennial year begin the third period. Its history is yet to be made, but it commences with auspicious prospects."

The Livingston Avenue public-school building is one of the finest edifices of the kind in the State. It stands in the central part of the city, on a lot that cannot be excelled for healthfulness, beauty of location, and pleasant surroundings, conditions which will not be without their effect in stimulating both teachers and pupils to the high and noble endeavors required by a true education. The dimensions of the entire building are seventy-one feet front by one hundred and thirty-nine feet deep and sixty feet high, with a balustrade around the top four feet high, and a tower projecting in front of all five feet and rising to the height of one hundred feet from base to apex, above which a weather-vane spire rises ten feet, making the total height one hundred and ten feet.

On the 1st of July, 1869, the closing exercises of the first graduating class of the High School took place, since which time a class has been graduated at the close of each school year in June.

Since the organization of public schools in 1851 there have been seven principals, seven presidents of the board, four secretaries, five treasurers, fifty-two members of the board, and one hundred and sixty-eight teachers.

The following are the public school buildings in the city:

Bayard Street, erected 1852; estimated value, $30,000; seating capacity, 720; primary and grammar school.

French Street, erected 1854; estimated value, $5000; seating capacity, 150; primary school.

Carman Street, erected 1861; estimated value, $12,000; seating capacity, 400; primary school.

Hale Street, erected 1871; estimated value, $8000; seating capacity, 100; primary and grammar (colored).

Guilden Street, erected 1873; estimated value, $20,000; seating capacity, 250; primary school.

Livingston Avenue, erected 1875; estimated value, $75,000; seating capacity, 750; grammar and high school.

PRESIDENTS.

James Bishop, April, 1851, to May, 1855.

SECRETARIES.

Henry Sanderson, April, 1851, to May, 1855.
Dr. Charles Dunham, May, 1855, to May, 1856.
J. G. Sweet, May, 1856, to May, 1857.
Lewis Applegate, May, 1857, to May, 1882.

TREASURERS.

John B. Hill, May, 1855, to May, 1857.
Henry H. Palmer, May, 1857, to May, 1859.
Henry R. Baldwin, May, 1859, to May, 1861.
William Maloy, 1861, to December, 1867.
Lewis Applegate, December, 1867, to May, 1882.

The number of children of school age in the city in 1882 is 6305: females, 3067; males, 3238. Number enrolled, 1818; average attendance, 1743. Expenses for schools for the year ending May 1, 1882: ordinary current expenses, $27,447.62; extraordinary expenses, $12,302.13; paid teachers, $22,624.50.

Under the new law the colored children have been received into the other schools, leaving the school-house formerly occupied by them on Hale Street vacant.

STATISTICS.—The public school library contains at present 1364 volumes, of which the "Reference Library" contains 77 volumes; the Miscellaneous Library, 867 volumes; and the George W. Deshler Memorial Library, 420 volumes. The number of books drawn the past year has been nearly fifty per cent. in excess of that of any previous year, and the character of the books read shows that an improved taste for a better class of literature has been cultivated.

Some time since the Board of Education passed the following resolution in reference to the library:

"Resolved, That all givers of money or books to the public school library amounting to not less than twenty dollars shall have their names inserted on the list of honorary patrons, and shall be entitled to all its privileges."

In accordance with the above resolution the following names have been placed upon the list: Mr. Gustavus Auten, Mrs. Lewis Applegate, Mr. Charles D. Deshler.

The amount of money received and expended each year for the library up to the present time is as follows:

Rutgers College.—The Hollanders who settled in the province of New Netherland, comprising the territory between the Connecticut and Delaware Rivers, brought with them the love of religion and learning that characterized their mother-country. The memory of the great universities of Leyden and Utrecht, then the most renowned institutions in the world, was a part of their peculiar treasure and glory. It never occurred to them that the care of their churches could be committed to any but men thoroughly educated, not only in general knowledge, but also and especially in the constitution and doctrines adopted for the Reformed faith by the National Synod of Dort, 1618-19.

During the entire period of the Dutch supremacy, and for more than a century after the surrender of New Netherland to the English in 1664, it was their custom to call clergymen from Holland, or to send candidates thither for education and ordination. This arrangement did not, however, supply more than one-third the number of ministers needed. At one time, for example, there were only seventeen ministers for sixty churches. And, moreover, while it sometimes failed to secure good men, it was always attended with delay and expense. Several prominent ministers, therefore, hoping to effect a gradual change for the better, met in the city of New York, 1737, and drew up a plan for a yearly assembly or "Coetus," which should be composed of delegates, lay and clerical, from every church, and which, under the permission of the Classis of Amsterdam, should have power in special cases to ordain ministers, as well as to exercise limited jurisdiction over the churches represented. After a delay of nine years the Classis of Amsterdam finally gave its consent to the official organization of the Coetus; but the majority of its members growing restive under their restricted privileges, and feeling sorely the need of a more efficient system of providing the gospel for their brethren in this New World, began to aim at the formation of an independent Classis, and at founding a college or seminary for the education of candidates for the pulpit. In 1755 they boldly proceeded to cut loose from the Classis of Amsterdam by organizing an American Classis, and by commissioning Rev. Theodorus Frelinghuysen, of Albany, to visit Holland to solicit funds from those in sympathy with the American movement for the establishment of an academy. The conservative wing of the Coetus, believing it would be impossible for the Dutch people alone to provide means for training up a learned ministry in this country, and regarding the above proceedings as radical and destructive, withdrew and formed an opposition party under the name of "Conferentie," the Dutch equivalent for Coetus, and meaning an assembly. The warfare between these two parties (both of which, while differing as to methods, were yet animated by the same motive, namely, the desire to secure a learned ministry) was bitter and violent in the extreme, dividing congregations and often families into hostile and abusive factions.

Mr. Frelinghuysen did not, however, sail for Holland until 1759. How far this progressive spirit and excellent divine succeeded is not known,—he died while returning on ship off Sandy Hook. After long and violent opposition from the Conferentie party, and the rejection of proposals from the Episcopals on the one side to unite with Kings College (which had been established in 1754), and from the Presbyterians to unite with the College of New Jersey (now at Princeton, and which had been established in 1746), the Coetus party undertook in 1769 to embody their plan for an independent institution in a tangible result. The charter was reduced to form, the name of Queen's College, as expressive of loyalty and as an antithesis to the name of Kings College, was decided upon, and a board of trustees was elected.

On March 20, 1770, in the tenth year of the reign of George III., William Franklin, Governor of the province of New Jersey, granted the long-desired charter. Its principal provision declared that the college was founded "for the education of youth in the learned languages, liberal and useful arts and sciences, and especially in divinity, preparing them for the ministry and other good offices." Another provision required that there should always be at least one professor or teacher grammatically to instruct the students in the knowledge of the English language, while all the minutes, rules of order, and financial transactions should be in the "same language and no other." In the outset it had been intended to exclude English entirely from the college, but the necessity of a change of purpose on this point had forced itself upon the conviction of all but the aged and hopelessly conservative. For although it was considered as late as 1763 "a dreadful innovation" that Dominie Archibald Laidlie should be called to New York as the first pastor in the Reformed Churches to preach in the English language, yet the younger generation in New York and vicinity could not at that date understand Dutch preaching, and in 1770 an enlightened regard for the situation and future growth inspired the founders to make English the leading tongue in their college. Forty trustees were appointed by the charter, including, ex officio, the Governor or commander-in-chief of the colony of New Jersey, the chief justice of the colony of New Jersey, and the attorney-general of the colony of New Jersey.

The seal was to bear the motto, Sol justitie et occidentem illustra.

On May 7, 1771, at a meeting of the trustees held at Hackensack, the location of the college, which was desired both at Hackensack and at New Brunswick, was fixed at the latter place, because its citizens, through the influence of Dr. J. R. Hardenbergh and Hendrick Fischer, had come forward with a great amount of subscriptions, and perhaps also because New Brunswick, being larger and situated on the line of travel between New York and Philadelphia, gave higher promise of prosperity for the institution. In October of the same year the long-contending factions of the Coetus and Conferentie were induced, mainly by the agency of Dr. John H. Livingston, to strike hands in fellowship on the basis of the organization of the Dutch Reformed Churches in America into a Synod and five Classes independent of the mother-country, and with power to license and ordain ministers. But the Conferentie party so far carried their point that the united body were not to have a theological professorship in connection with Queen's College, thus defeating the object which had been so dear to the hearts of the Coetus party. "One or more theological professors were to be chosen from the Netherlands, upon the advice of Classis, who were to have no connection with any English academies."

And yet Queen's College, whose proposed establishment sixteen years before had been the occasion of the division, became now by its actual establishment the main element in the reconciliation, for the approval by the Classis of Amsterdam of the plan for the union and ecclesiastical independence of the American churches had been given upon the express condition that provision should be made for education, "as the Church of Holland could not and would not acknowledge or maintain any connection with a Church which did not provide herself with an educated ministry." And Queen's College, though not brought into official relation with the theological professorship about to be founded, was nevertheless regarded as the child of the Dutch Reformed denomination, and would, it was expected, furnish preparatory training to young men on their way to the study of divinity. "The Synod made but feeble attempts, in fact, to secure a professor of divinity, while the trustees with remarkable energy determined to carry out their plan of a combined literary and theological institution." Negotiations to this end were interrupted by the Revolutionary war.

The precise date of the opening of the college, owing to the loss of the first book minutes, cannot now be ascertained. "It must have been," says Mr. Bradley in his centennial oration, "prior to 1775, and was probably as early as 1772." Dr. John H. Livingston having declined the presidency, a committee of the trustees was appointed to act as the "faculty." The members of this committee were selected on account of their learning and judgment, and it was their duty to attend the quarterly examinations and to recommend candidates to the board for academic degrees. Thus in 1782 it appears from the minutes that Rev. Mr. Froeligh and James Schureman were added to the faculty, and in 1790 Dr. Lewis Dunham and R. C. Chapman. The actual instruction and management of the institution were for many years performed by tutors of the college and teachers of the grammar school. Since the name of Dr. Jacob Rutsen Hardenbergh, who had been exceedingly active and influential in obtaining the charter, appears as president on the diploma of Simeon De Witt under date of Oct. 5, 1776, it is inferred that he had been filling, possibly from the outset and certainly on some occasions, the office of president pro tempore, although he continued to discharge his duties as pastor at Raritan. And not only did this brave and self-sacrificing spirit give instruction in the languages, moral philosophy, and other branches, but in company with Rev. John Leydt he went from door to door through New Brunswick begging money for an endowment. He was a man of great energy and sound judgment, and is entitled to the praise of being the chief founder of the college. His wife was the widow of John Frelinghuysen, and grandmother of Theodore Frelinghuysen, the subsequent president. Her keen intellect, deep and fervent piety, and helpful sympathy in behalf of the young college have made her name honored and cherished among all the families of the Reformed faith. Her son, Frederick Frelinghuysen, was the first tutor in the college. He was a man of thorough scholarship, and of abilities that subsequently made him eminent as a lawyer and patriot. Another of the early tutors, and probably Mr. Frelinghuysen's successor, was Col. John Taylor, who continued in the institution with the exception of one or two intervals down to 1793. Col. Taylor, like most of those connected with the college, was devoted to the cause of American liberty. He drilled the students as a military company, and subsequently took part in the battles at Princeton, Germantown, and elsewhere. He wrote text-books in natural philosophy, and rendered efficient service to education in various ways. Under these faithful men, whose hope and courage are always deserving of grateful mention, thirteen students were graduated before 1776. Among these was Hon. Simeon De Witt, who became surveyor-general of the United States and afterward of the State of New York, and by whom the present plan of laying out the lands of our Western domain was devised.

In the fall of 1776, the British troops having taken possession of New Brunswick and burned it, it is believed, the original college building, teachers and students were scattered. After a brief suspension of literary exercises the college began a new but migratory existence. In consequence of the irregularities likely to be caused by the presence of soldiers its sessions were held now at Millstone and now at North Branch, while the commencement of 1778 was held at New Brunswick. At this time and for some years subsequently the future of the institution was dark enough. The General Synod would only recognize it as a preparatory school, and the value of its promised care over it was much diminished by the appointment of a committee to establish a similar school at Schenectady.

In June, 1785, the trustees united with the consistories of New Brunswick and Six-Mile Run in calling Dr. J. R. Hardenbergh to be at once pastor of the two churches and permanent president of the college. He accepted, and continued in office greatly beloved until his resignation a few months before his lamented death in 1790.

The record of events during this period is of the most meagre character. The country was painfully emerging from the prostration of the Revolutionary struggle. The currency was in a deplorable condition. The citizens of New Brunswick had suffered more than the rest of New Jersey. Their property had been devastated, their business broken up, their churches burned or dismantled, their securities depreciated. The insignificant funds of the college had been invested in bonds and mortgages, on which poor people could pay neither principal nor interest. It may well be conceived, therefore, that it cost the trustees a struggle to rebuild and equip their burnt college. This they accomplished in 1790, locating it on the present site of the Second Presbyterian Church in New Brunswick, where, according to tradition, their former building had stood.

This earliest college building of which anything is definitely known was a two-story frame white house, fronting the north, and with its gable end turned in true Dutch style towards George Street. It was without cupola or belfry, and was as plain and unpretending in its architecture as the simple taste of the day demanded. This building continued to be occupied by the grammar school and college until 1811, when it was sold to the city for a Lancasterian school, and was moved down the hill below George Street, where it still stands, on the north side of Schureman Street.

The position of president pro tempore was occupied about this time first by Rev. William Linn, of the Collegiate Church in New York, and then by Rev. Dr. Ira Condict, who had followed Dr. Hardenbergh as pastor of the church in New Brunswick, and who was eminently active in performing various duties in behalf of the college. Unsuccessful attempts having been made to unite the college with the synodical professorship, or with the College of New Jersey, or to remove it to some other place nearer New York, it was forced on account of financial embarrassments to close its doors in 1795.

Although this first period of Queen's College was troublous, yet it had accomplished good work. There were graduated from it over sixty young men, of whom ten were subsequently licensed by the Dutch Reformed Church, while several others became celebrated leaders in politics and science.

To Rev. Dr. Ira Condict belongs the credit of originating a new movement in 1807 for the revival of the college. He was a man of untiring energy, public-spirited, and always ready to make any sacrifice in order to secure a noble object. Under his leadership the General Synod agreed to establish a theological professorship in the college, and ten thousand dollars were subscribed towards it in a few days in New York alone. The college was reopened with Dr. Condict first as temporary and then as permanent president. A new, large, and spacious stone edifice was begun in 1807, and so far advanced in 1811 as to be serviceable. Dr. Condict assumed instruction of the highest class, which entered junior. His son, Harrison Condict, became tutor; Robert Adrain, LL.D., took the chair of mathematics, and Dr. Livingston accepted the professorship of theology. Through the influence of Hon. James Parker, the devisees of the elder James Parker donated five acres of ground, to which was added by purchase another plot of one and one-third acres, which together form the present beautiful campus. Dr. Condict, after having raised over sixty thousand dollars by his own exertions in New Brunswick and vicinity, and given the best strength of his life to the college in manifold directions, died in 1810. During the same year Dr. J. H. Livingston accepted a renewed call to the presidency, but as he was mainly interested with his theological classes he did little more for the college proper than to "preside on public occasions and sign diplomas."

The funds were increased, according to the fashion of those times, by a lottery, which was duly authorized by the Legislature, and the proceeds of which amounted to eleven thousand dollars.

At the solicitation of parties interested in a medical college in Duane Street, New York, the trustees in 1812 appointed the medical faculty of that institution to be a medical faculty in Queen's College, but as this department never had more than a nominal connection with Queen's College it may be dismissed from further notice.

The number of students was encouraging, but since the church was chiefly interested in the theological professorship, and the trustees were unable to raise means for the completion of the new building and the proper equipment of the literary department, the exercises were suspended again in 1816. Degrees, however, were conferred by the trustees until 1818.

During this period of nine years forty-one students were graduated. Eight of these entered the theological seminary, and one, Cornelius L. Hardenbergh, a grandson of the first president, became subsequently professor of law in the institution.

CHANGE OF NAME.—As Queen's College had been originated by the Dutch Reformed denomination in the strong desire to provide itself with an efficient and learned ministry, so its revival once more under the name of Rutgers College in 1825 is traceable to the same cause. "Immediately after the death of Dr. Livingston, in 1825, Dr. John De Witt proposed the resuscitation of the college in the hope of increasing the number of theological students, and was seconded by Dr. Milledoler." The theological department had been kept running as a distinct affair during the quiescence of the college, and the plan was now to obtain from the church endowments for three professorships (two of which were already in existence and partially endowed) in the theological seminary, and then to have the three professors give gratuitous instruction, and at the same time to make an effort for independent professorships in the college. The Collegiate Church in New York agreed to pay seventeen hundred dollars a year for three years, provided that the General Synod should raise twenty-five thousand dollars as a permanent fund, and that the college exercises should be recommenced. And the promise was fulfilled. Over fifty thousand dollars were eventually subscribed, of which twenty-seven thousand, contributed by the northern section of the church, were set apart for the new and third professorship. The election of Abraham Van Neste as trustee helped very greatly to bring about this happy result. "The college edifice and lot had been transferred to the Synod in 1825, in consideration of the latter advancing the sum of four thousand dollars to pay off a debt which the trustees had incurred." In September, 1825, an additional covenant was adopted by which the Synod allowed the trustees the free use of such parts of the seminary building, formerly belonging to the college, as might be necessary, and by which the two institutions became generally more closely united. Dr. Milledoler became president, and professors were appointed. . . . The distribution of duties was as follows: "Moral Philosophy and Evidences of Christianity, to the Professor of Didactic Theology; Belles-Lettres, Elements of Criticism and Logic, to the Professor of Biblical Literature; Metaphysics and Mental Philosophy, to the newly-elected Professor of Church History; grammatical instruction of the theological students in Hebrew and Greek was assigned to the Professor of Languages; special provision was made for the religious education of the students; biblical recitations under the conduct of the president, and Sabbath services in the Theological Hall were appointed. The government of the college was intrusted to a board of six superintendents, appointed by the Synod and trustees in equal parts. Its administration was given to a faculty consisting of the president, professors, and tutors. That the course of education might be more beneficial, the number of pay students was limited to one hundred. It was deemed expedient to drop the name of Queen's, as it recalled the condition of vassalage from which the nation had been delivered. The present name, Rutgers College, was chosen by the Synod in consideration of the character and services of Col. Henry Rutgers." He gave five thousand dollars towards its endowment. Thirty students attended, and the number was soon increased to sixty. The building was adorned with a cupola, in which a bell was hung, and a grammar school edifice was erected. The library, for which the trustees had appropriated eighteen hundred dollars as early as 1815, was increased, a mineralogical cabinet was commenced, and a society of natural history organized by the students. An English and scientific school was established in 1832, under Mr. Mortimer, and a medical school again attempted, which, however, was soon abandoned. Medical degrees were not conferred after 1835, and only rarely after 1827.

In 1833 the corps of instructors was increased by the election of Rev. Dr. Jacob J. Janeway to the vice-presidency and to an unsalaried professorship of the Evidences of Christianity and Political Economy. And to insure fuller instruction in Hebrew, a professorship of Oriental Literature was created, and its duties assigned to the Professor of Biblical Literature.

From 1825 to 1840 two hundred and fifty-eight students were graduated, of whom seventy-one were licensed by the Reformed Church, and many of the others became eminent in other learned professions. In the class of 1836, for example, occur the names of Joseph P. Bradley, LL.D., associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; George W. Coakley, LL.D., Professor of Mathematics in the New York University; Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, formerly United States senator; William A. Newell, M.D., ex-member of Congress and ex-Governor of New Jersey; and Hon. Cortlandt Parker, LL.D., one of the most eminent and successful lawyers in New Jersey.

Owing to a division of sentiment in the church, the relations between the college and the Synod were in 1840 partially sundered. The theological professors were released from obligation to give free instruction in the college; the president of the college was no longer to be one of the theological professors; and the trustees were to have henceforth the appointment of the president and the professors, as well as the provision and disbursement of funds, and the administration of affairs generally. By a legal instrument the Synod guaranteed to the trustees the free use of the library-room, the chapel, and recitation-rooms, and bound itself not to sell or lease the same without the consent of the trustees. Tuition fees for beneficiaries were allowed out of the income of the educational funds.

Dr. Janeway had resigned in 1839, and his duties were now assigned to the president. The presidency, after the resignation of Dr. Milledoler in 1840, became filled the same year by Hon. Abraham B. Hasbrouck, who, by his lectures on constitutional law, his genial manners and generous hospitality, contributed greatly during the subsequent ten years to the prosperity of the institution. The theological professors from 1840 to 1867 continued voluntarily and gratuitously to give instruction in the departments from which they had been entirely released as a matter of obligation, and thus they aided the trustees immensely in their efforts to render the college independent, and to make its curriculum equal to that of other first-class colleges. The faculty was enlarged by the creation of a professorship of Modern Languages and of an adjunct professorship of Ancient Languages. The need of more lecture-rooms was soon felt, and through the efforts of the alumni a building was erected for the use of the literary societies and other purposes and named Van Neste Hall, in recognition of services rendered. A residence for the president was also built, and a fund secured for his support, making the entire endowment over $50,000. The graduating classes were not, however, large. They numbered on the average from 1840 to 1850 only about eighteen students. This is said to have been caused by the misunderstandings which prevailed throughout the church on the policy of church extension and on the relation of the college to the Synod. During the controversy Mr. Hasbrouck resigned the presidency, and his place was immediately filled by Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen. The college now entered upon a new career of prosperity. Mr. Frelinghuysen was a man of unusual wisdom and guilelessness; his disposition was naturally gentle and always pervaded by a thorough Christian spirit; his manners were conciliatory, and his intellect as discerning as his heart was upright. His influence, therefore, over the church, as well as over individuals nearly related to the controversy that had for many years involved the college, was strong and of the happiest nature. The feeling of loyalty to the institution began to extend through the entire denomination. During the decade following the second year of his administration the average number of the graduating class ran up to nearly twenty-three, while a larger number than ever before were, on account of increased requirements in scholarship, prevented from graduation. In the class of 1862 there were thirty-eight graduates. Considerable success attended an attempt to increase the endowment fund by the sale of scholarships for $500 each. In 1856 the removal of the seminary into Hertzog Hall, which had just been completed, afforded the college increased accommodations for recitation-rooms, and changes in the board of trustees led to a complete change by the introduction of younger men in the character of the faculty in 1859 and the following years. A new professorship of English Language and Literature was created in 1860. Two years later Mr. Frelinghuysen died, universally regretted, and Rev. Dr. William H. Campbell was called to supply his place.

With Dr. Campbell's accession to the presidency the college took a new departure in almost every respect. Although the endowment had been increased during Mr. Frelinghuysen's term so that it amounted to about $75,000, yet it did not afford sufficient means to meet the salaries of the professors and current expenses. The principal was being consumed. At the same time the number of students, owing to enlistments in the army, to the distracting excitement of the civil war, and to the extraordinary temptations to business enterprises, was diminished to nearly one-half of the usual number. In the graduating class of 1863 there were only fifteen, and in that of 1864 only eleven.

The prospect was disheartening, and yet the president addressed himself boldly to the task of begging money and of selling limited scholarships at $100 each. He presented the claims of the college in the pulpits of the denomination and to individuals until he raised for a "new endowment fund" the sum of $144,758. But it is only just to add that this great work could never have been accomplished had it not been for the sympathy of every heart and the help of every hand growing out of the influences of the preceding administrations of Mr. Frelinghuysen and Mr. Hasbrouck. This amount lifted the college up to independence, and opened the way for enlarging the course of study by the creation of new professorships.

SCIENTIFIC DEPARTMENT.—In 1864 the trustees purchased, by payment of $12,000 to the Synod, the entire right and title of the latter in the college buildings and premises, on condition that they should never be used for any other than collegiate purposes, and that the president and three-fourths of the trustees shall always be members in full communion of the Reformed Church. And in 1865 the Synod still further, upon application of the trustees, formally abrogated the covenant relations of 1807 and 1825. Thus Rutgers College became recognized as absolutely independent and non-sectarian. The fruits of the new endowment now began to be apparent in the establishment of several new professorships. In 1863 a new department, called the Rutgers Scientific School, was organized to meet the demands for more thorough and complete instruction in scientific and practical studies.

STATE COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE.—The State College of New Jersey, "for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," was organized as a department in Rutgers College in 1865, under an act of the Legislature of New Jersey passed April 4, 1864, and was made a part of the Scientific School already in existence. Its object was to carry into effect the provision of an act of Congress granting to the several States a certain quantity of the public lands to enable them to establish colleges, the leading object of which shall be "to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life."

The sale of the public lands allotted to New Jersey amounted to $116,000, which sum is invested in State bonds under the care of the State treasurer; and the income, at the rate of six per cent. interest, is paid to the trustees. Much credit is due to Dr. George H. Cook, professor in the college and also State geologist, for his energy and influence in securing the location of the State College erected at New Brunswick by these funds as a part of Rutgers College. This State College, or, as it is generally called, "The Scientific School," was opened for students in 1865. A farm of one hundred acres was immediately purchased for the illustration and development of agriculture. The school has now ten professorships, all ably manned and affording instruction in three courses of study, namely, one in civil engineering and mechanics, one in chemistry and agriculture, and one especially in chemistry. Its courses of study and discipline are under the immediate management of the faculty and trustees of Rutgers College, subject to the supervision and approval of a board of visitors appointed by the Governor, and consisting of two from each congressional district. It provides for the State forty free scholarships, which are distributed among the counties according to their population.

From 1865 onward, therefore, the history of Rutgers College is a history of both the old college proper, or literary institution, and of the State College, or Scientific School. The two are served by the same professors; their classes, though distinct, unite in many subjects in the same recitations, and are known by the same designations. The interests of the two departments, in short, are made to harmonize with and to aid each other. And the reciprocal benefits derived from this intercommunication and union can hardly be exaggerated. The young men in the literary department are allowed to pursue practical chemistry by making actual analyses in the laboratory along with the scientific students; and the latter, in turn, compete with the former in elocution and composition, in mental and moral philosophy, in political economy and constitutional law, and in biblical recitations. The scientific students are thus preserved from the narrowing process of a purely technical education. They do, indeed, get enough of technical training to prepare them, when a little experience has been added to their theoretical knowledge, for entrance at once upon civil engineering and analytical chemistry and into various mechanical and industrial spheres, but along with this they absorb the refining and liberalizing influences which spring from the enlarged culture alluded to above, and which it requires four years to complete. In addition to this the students of both departments join the same literary societies, and thus confer upon each other all the advantages resulting from the generous emulation and contact of minds engaged at many points on different subjects, and having different objects of ambition. The happy effects of these interacting, stimulating, and elevating associations are soon manifested in the character and aspirations of the entering pupils. The Scientific College has done already a noble and far-reaching service in thus educating thoroughly and symmetrically all the faculties of its students, while it has not failed to prepare them for the highest kind of work in practical science and important industries.

In 1866-72 several new professorships were founded, namely, one of analytical chemistry, one of engineering and military tactics, one of mining and metallurgy, one of political economy and constitutional law, and an adjunct professorship of mathematics and graphics. In 1867-68, Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, now associate justice in the Supreme Court of the United States, gave a course of lectures on Political Economy and Constitutional Law; in 1868-69 he added a most instructive and satisfactory course on the English Bible.

The religious influences belonging to the college have always been marked and happy, while at the same time entirely free from the bias of sectarianism. A Bible-class including all the students is taught every Sabbath morning by the president; and this is followed by a sermon, with the attendant services, under the conduct of one of the clerical members of the faculty or one of the professors of the theological seminary. A general prayer-meeting for all the students is held every day at 12 M., and another general meeting for fraternal conference as well as prayer is held on every Thursday evening. In addition to these are class prayer-meetings, and other exercises for practical religious work.

The celebration of the centennial of the existence of the college took place in 1870. By this celebration it was designed to gain two ends: 1. To recount the goodness of God in his care for the college, and to return thanks for the same; 2. To further in some marked way and degree the interests of the college.

It was proposed to accomplish the second of these objects by soliciting subscriptions and by the sale of scholarships at one thousand dollars each, with the proceeds of which needed buildings might be erected and new professorships founded. Dr. Campbell again undertook the work of raising funds. Several of the trustees nobly responded to his appeal by giving five thousand dollars each; and the alumni and friends, with unwonted enthusiasm and unanimity, came forward with such gifts as each could afford in aid of the cause. The president canvassed the churches, and sought help from all who would be likely to be interested in the welfare of the college. Under his guidance committees were selected from the former classes to gather class offerings, and June 21, 1870, was appointed to hear the reports from these committees as well as to renew old associations and old love for Alma Mater. This meeting was opened with an historical discourse by Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, and the reports, interspersed with college songs, followed. Seldom, if ever, has there been held by the alumni and friends of any institution in the land a meeting so happy in feeling and so productive of immediate and substantial results as this immense centennial gathering, which marks one of the most memorable days in Rutgers' calendar. The aggregate of the sums reported was large and encouraging. And so the president continued his labors until one hundred and forty thousand dollars were subscribed, of which one hundred and twenty-one thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars have actually been paid.

A short time after this Mrs. S. A. Kirkpatrick died, leaving to the college a bequest which amounted to seventy-five thousand dollars. Another bequest from Mr. Abraham Voorhees, of Six-Mile Run, N. J., consisting of twenty-five thousand dollars for a professorship, and of twenty-six thousand four hundred dollars for a permanent fund to be employed in maintaining and educating pious young men for the ministry, had been received in 1867. And in 1872, Mr. James Suydam, a trustee and a great benefactor to New Brunswick institutions, died, leaving by will twenty thousand dollars to the college. With these increased resources the college was enabled to advance to the very first rank among American institutions by providing thorough instruction and in a much greater number of subjects than were ever before embraced in its curriculum, by increasing the requirements of applicants for admission, and by erecting buildings for more ample and needed accommodations. Besides, extensive repairs were made throughout the main building, and its two ends, which had been used up to 1865 and 1867 as residences by two theological professors, were converted into recitation-rooms, and an astronomical observatory, a geological hall, the Kirkpatrick chapel and library, and a grammar school building were all erected in rapid succession.

There has always been in connection with the college a grammar school, which during the darkest days of the college never closed its doors, but went on successfully in accomplishing good work. It now sends thirty boys annually into the freshman class of the college.

The campus, containing six and one-third acres, is quadrilateral in form, with five hundred and sixty-five feet fronting on Somerset Street, and six hundred and sixty-five feet on Hamilton Street on the opposite side, while the east end extends four hundred and seventy-seven feet along George Street, and the west end runs four hundred and sixty-seven and one-half feet along College Avenue. It slopes beautifully from all sides upward towards the centre, and from the corners on Somerset Street, where stand massive stone and iron gateways, a carriage-drive, curved nearly in the shape of a semi-ellipse, runs in front of the main building, while a branch drive circles in front of the president's house. Many and noble elms, besides other deciduous trees and evergreens, cover the ground, affording delightful shade for the undergraduates in summer, and equally attractive retreats for the meeting of friends and alumni at commencement.

In about the centre of this unusually charming campus stands the oldest and main college building. Its corner-stone was laid on April 27, 1809, by Rev. Dr. Ira Condict. It was not entirely finished till after 1825. This is a substantial and finely proportioned edifice of brownstone, one hundred and seventeen feet long by fifty-five feet deep, having a gracefully pitched roof, from the central portion of which rises a handsome belfry. It is three stories high, exclusive of the attic, and contains nine recitation-rooms, a draughting-room fifty-five by thirty feet, a residence for the janitor, and other accommodations for apparatus and collegiate work. It cost over thirty thousand dollars, and, having been recently repaired at an expense of six thousand dollars, it is now in first-rate condition.

Van Neste Hall was built in 1845 by the alumni, and named after Abraham Van Neste, Esq., a liberal trustee, in recognition of his services to the college. It is of brick, painted, and is fifty-two feet front by sixty-two feet deep, with a low hip-roof. It contains, besides a basement in the rear, two large halls for the Peithessophian and Philoclean Literary Societies, and two small rooms used for storing duplicate mineralogical specimens. On the second floor are a laboratory, a chemical lecture-room, and a hall recently used as a museum of natural history. The actual cost is unknown; the estimated cost, ten thousand dollars.

The president's house was erected in 1841-42. It is built of brick, painted, and is fifty-two feet front by forty-two feet deep. It is admirably adapted for a president's mansion. The cost is estimated at $8000. In 1875 it was thoroughly repaired.

The Daniel S. Schanck astronomical observatory was erected in 1865, at a cost of $6166, contributed by the benevolent gentleman whose name it bears. In its architecture it is a copy of the Temple of the Winds at Athens, consisting of two octagonal towers connected together by a short passageway. The extreme length of the building, including the porch, is thirty-seven and one-half feet, and its width twenty feet. Its material is brick, painted. The main portion is of two stories, capped by a revolving roof, and contains a brick pier built free from the floors, to support the equatorial telescope. The other part is square, one story in height, and provided with doors in the walls and roof opening along the meridian. It contains three brick piers, free from the floor, for mounting the meridian circle and sidereal clock. The building was opened for use in 1866.

Meteorological observations have been made here, but never published. Since Jan. 1, 1876, observations of temperature, rainfall, wind, etc., have been made at the college farm, and it is proposed to continue the series.

The Geological Hall was dedicated to science at the commencement of 1873. It is a large brownstone structure, having a hip-roof, with dormer-windows from each quarter. It is, exclusive of porch and steps, forty-five feet front by one hundred and five feet deep. In the basement is an armory ninety by forty feet; also an assaying-room, a workshop, and other smaller rooms for furnaces, etc. On the first floor are a reception-room or office, a commodious chemical lecture-room, a recitation-room, two store-rooms for chemicals, a balance-room for the safe keeping of nicely-adjusted balances, a professor's laboratory, and a large analytical laboratory for students. On the second floor is a splendid hall ninety by forty feet, with lofty ceiling and gallery extending entirely around it. This is the museum. The cost of the hall was $50,000.

The Kirkpatrick Chapel and Library is built of brownstone, and is in the French Gothic style of the fourteenth century. It has a front of fifty-two feet, and a depth of one hundred and twenty-eight feet. The entrance to the chapel is through a porch of five heavy archways. The auditorium is exceedingly beautiful, having a roof of open timber, finished in black walnut and stained pine, resting for its centre support on slender iron columns painted to correspond with the delicately-tinted walls. The windows are of stained glass. The walls are lined with portraits of former presidents, professors, and trustees. At one end is a gallery containing an organ purchased in 1866 by the students; at the other is the pulpit.

Back of the chapel there is a large room designed for the president's classes, and adjoining is an assembly-room for the trustees. Above these rooms is the library. This is finished with open timber roof in the native wood, and is adorned with massive oak cases, which form alcoves.

The whole building is as tasteful as it is useful. It cost $52,376, and was erected with part of the money bequeathed to the college by the late Mrs. S. A. Kirkpatrick.

The library numbers 8000 volumes. The two literary societies have libraries of about 4000 volumes, while the Sage Seminary Library, now of about 35,000 volumes, is open to the students.

The grammar school was entirely reconstructed, at a cost of $15,000, in 1869. It is now fitted with the best kind of furniture, and has ample accommodation for two hundred pupils. A new building, needed for agricultural purposes, was erected in 1876 on the college farm, at a cost of $2000.

The principal room in Geological Hall is the one devoted to the collections in natural history. It is a room forty-five by ninety feet, and twenty-two feet high, with a gallery all around. In this the cabinets in geology, mineralogy, and natural history generally are arranged. The spacious hall is large enough to accommodate the growing cabinets for many years to come. Its stores are already respectable, and in some departments the specimens are among the best.

The Beck cabinet of minerals, which was collected by the late Professor Lewis C. Beck, and was purchased by friends of the college, is kept here. It contains 274 species of minerals, and more than 2800 specimens altogether.

The Laing cabinet of minerals, shells, coins, and medals, which was collected by the late James B. Laing, Esq., of Kinderhook, and bequeathed to the college by his will, is also among the treasures of the museum. It cost a very large sum of money, and has added very many beautiful and rare specimens to the various collections.

A duplicate set of the rocks, ores, minerals, fossils, soils, fertilizers, and other useful natural products, from the geological survey of New Jersey, is also in the museum. It contains characteristic rocks from all the geological formations in the State, ores from more than one hundred rich iron-mines, from the great zinc-mines, and from many of the promising but uncertain copper-mines, marls from all the best pits in the State, fire and potter's clay in great variety, soils of all characters, and fossils representative of all the different ages. This collection numbers more than 900 good specimens.

The bones of a mastodon found in Salem County were purchased by the trustees of the college and are in the museum.

The skeleton of a whale, forty-two feet long, which was taken in Raritan Bay, near New Brunswick, has been given to the college by a liberal friend, and as soon as its bones are bleached enough for mounting it will be set up. A choice collection of coal fossils, including stems, bark, leaves, fruit, roots, and one large stump of a tree, is in the museum as a gift from the late Rev. Dr. Polhemus and others. The collection of marl fossils is particularly good. Friends in the college and in Monmouth County have contributed liberally to this collection, and there are many who never allow any opportunity for getting specimens for the college to pass unimproved. The collection of shells, corals, fish-teeth, turtle-bones, and bones of saurians is large, and constantly increasing by donations. An interesting and fine collection of the rocks of Europe, with many ores and products of metallurgy, numbering in all more than 200 specimens, has been purchased by a friend and presented to the college. A large number of shells from China and other Eastern countries were also presented by the late Rev. Dr. E. Doty.

The Rutgers College Natural History Society contributed largely to the collections in the museum. The class of 1858, in concert with Rev. Samuel Lockwood, Ph.D., contributed rare and valuable Devonian fossils; the class of 1862 contributed a large collection of crystals and ores; and other classes and individual students have left substantial evidence of their share in making the collection. There is a considerable collection of birds, an herbarium is well begun, and a collection of the woods of New Jersey is now being made. Rev. Dr. A. R. Van Nest, during his long residence in Florence and other parts of Italy, has procured and sent to the college a fine collection of beautiful polished stones, marbles, and other interesting specimens and curiosities. At the commencement of 1873 liberal friends contributed a sum sufficient to pay for cases in which to arrange the geological, mineralogical, and other collections.

There are two literary societies, named "Peithesophian" and "Philoclean." They were founded in 1828, and their object is to train their members in composition, declamation, and debate. Nearly every student is a member of one of these societies, and they are about equal in numbers. They have halls provided by the trustees, but these halls are furnished at the expense of the societies. Their libraries number nineteen hundred volumes each.

A chapter of the "Phi Beta Kappa Society" was established in the college on Feb. 22, 1868.

The "Rutgers College Bible Society," which has for its object the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, was founded in 1829. It has for a long time been enabled to send from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-five dollars annually to the American Bible Society. It has now eighty members, and has had six hundred and twenty-five in all since its foundation.

The Temperance Society was organized in 1873; the Base-Ball Association in 1860; the Foot-Ball Club in 1868; the Boating Association in 1867; the Alumni Association in 1832.

While Rutgers College is not a free institution, yet ample provision is made for granting free tuition to every young man who has a good character for morality and studiousness, and who is not able to pay his own way. And besides these general arrangements, it has several large and productive sources of beneficiary aid.

Theological Seminary.¹—The Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States had its origin in the desire to educate young men for the ministry in this country instead of being dependent for a supply upon Holland, and particularly upon the Classis of Amsterdam. Difference of opinion upon this important question divided the Church into the Coetus and Conferentie parties, involving an unhappy controversy, which lasted for many years. During this controversy the Coetus party not only struggled for independent American judicatories but also contemplated the establishment of a university, with regular advantages for a theological training, and in May, 1755, commissioned Rev. Theodore Frelinghuysen to solicit funds for that object in Holland. His departure was delayed for four years, and this, together with the unhappy schism in the church, defeated the movement. Eight years after this J. H. Livingston, while studying for the ministry in Holland, proposed to his friends in America that both contending parties should fix on some poor but sprightly boy and send him to Holland to be specially trained for a professor in the American churches, (liberal friends in Holland promising to defray the expenses), and thus ultimately perhaps the schism might be healed, and the churches here supplied with a satisfactory ministry.

This plan seems not to have been long entertained, for soon after Mr. Livingston formed the acquaintance of Dr. Witherspoon, who had been called from Europe to take the presidency of the college at Princeton, and who had visited Holland before embarking for America; and attempts were now made to secure arrangements for the education of ministers for the Reformed Church at the Princeton institutions. This, however, was opposed by the party leaders in America, and the proposition, as well as that of the Conferentie, to establish a divinity professorship in Kings College, was defeated in the subsequent articles of union, which stipulated that the professors of theology to be chosen from the Netherlands by the advice of the Classis should have no connection with any English academies, but should deliver lectures on theology, etc., in their own houses. They were not intended to be pastors, but a fund was to be raised for their support. As no such endowment could be immediately obtained, some of the most influential churches standing aloof from the union, and the disturbed political condition of the country rendering it impossible to proceed, no steps were taken to establish a professorship till after the Revolution. The Synod in the mean time advised students to study at their convenience with Drs. Livingston, Westerlow, Rysdyck, Hardenbergh, or Goetchius.

While the subject of the professorship was thus pending, the trustees of Queen's College sought to carry out the plans of the Coetus party by calling Rev. John Brown, of Haddington, Scotland, to become their professor of divinity. He, however, declined. They subsequently wrote to the Classis of Amsterdam and to the Theological Faculty at Utrecht to recommend to them a professor of theology, to be also president of their college and a member of the ecclesiastical judicatories in America. The Synod indorsed the action of the trustees in 1774, and the next year the Classis, in concurrence with the Faculty at Utrecht, recommended their last American student, Dr. Livingston, as the professor. But the battle of Lexington had already been fought, and the subject was postponed.

At the close of the Revolution the subject of the professorship at once occupied the attention of the churches. Dr. Livingston was in favor of having a Divinity Hall opened in New Brunswick, because it was the most central place for all portions of the Reformed Church, the Dutch in New York and New Jersey, and the Germans in Pennsylvania. The Synod, however, decided to locate the chair in the city of New York. In October, 1784, Dr. J. H. Livingston was chosen professor of theology, and Dr. H. Meyer, pastor at Totowa and Pompton Plains, professor of languages. Dr. Livingston entered upon the duties of his professorship May 19, 1785; for a number of years he was very poorly supported, receiving previous to 1791 only a few *honoraria*² from students who were able to pay, and a few others from the Synod for the more indigent class. Only a few of the more wealthy students went to New York on account of the cost of living in the city, and the rest studied with their pastors at home. This induced the Synod to appoint authorized lecturers in theology, to whom the country students could resort. One was appointed in 1786, viz.: Dr. Meyer, of Pompton; and in 1792, Dr. Solomon Froeligh, of Hackensack, and Dirck Romeyn, of Schenectady. These were afterwards raised to full professors.

In 1791 the Synod for the first time took active measures towards raising a fund for the endowment of the theological professorship. The consistory of the church in New York were at first made trustees of the fund, and Peter Wilson agent. Subsequently, in 1794, Peter Wilson, John Vanderbilt, Robert Benson, and Richard Varriek were made a board of trustees of the theological fund. During the two years from 1791 to 1793 the work of raising the endowment was suspended, owing to a proposition from Queen's College that the Synod should recommend to them a professor of theology, who should also take the presidency of the college, in accordance with the expectations excited in 1773. This the Synod declined to do until the institution was properly endowed.

In 1793 a very strong influence was brought to the General Synod in favor of an independent theological professorship. The Classis of Hackensack urged the Synod to establish such a school at once, and claimed that if the professorship should be connected with Queen's College it could only be a subordinate office. At the General Synod in June, 1794, a committee was appointed to report on this question, consisting of Revs. D. Romeyn, S. Froeligh, E. Van Bunschoten, and three elders. They reported that no union could be effected with Queen's College as long as it was situated at New Brunswick, that it ought to be removed to Bergen or Hackensack, and a committee was appointed to confer with the trustees on the subject. The committee at the same time reported that the Divinity School could not flourish in New York on account of the expense of living, that its continuance there prevented the raising of a fund, that the professor ought to remove to Flatbush, where a classical academy existed, or to some other place.

Prof. Livingston removed to Flatbush in the spring of 1796, relinquishing half of his services and half of his salary in the city, and receiving nothing in return. But the number of his students at once doubled, and everything appeared to be encouraging. The prosperity, however, lasted but a short time. The Synod failed to meet the financial requirements of the school, and Dr. Livingston's health becoming impaired by an over amount of unrequited labor, he deemed it advisable to leave his school at Flatbush and return to New York. Upon the announcement of this determination to the Synod Dr. Livingston received the thanks of that body for his gratuitous services, and was earnestly solicited to continue the duties of his office as he had previously done in connection with his pastorate in the city. Believing that it was "exceedingly inconvenient for all the students to get the certificate of one professor," and that "different localities would become interested by a professor residing among them," Synod distributed the school into three equal parts, to serve as many different localities by creating two other professors, viz., Drs. Froeligh and Romeyn, raised from the rank of lecturers in theology, to which they had been appointed in 1792.

In 1800 two professors of Hebrew were appointed, namely, Revs. John Bassett and Jeremiah Romeyn. Students desiring to be examined by the Classis for licensure must have a certificate of lingual attainments, signed by one of these professors.

Thus matters remained until the year 1806, with the exception that every day the prospects of the professorate grew more dark and dubious, until its most sanguine friends had become ready to despair concerning it. The uncertainty of location seemed to destroy every effort in its behalf. But just at this time the trustees of Queen's College made a proposition which prepared the way for the ultimate success of the institution. They were now engaged in earnest in the revival of their college, and they proposed to unite with it the theological professorship. The scheme was sanctioned by the General Synod, providing that all the moneys raised in the State of New York should be applied to the endowment of the theological professorship.

"A covenant was then drawn up between the parties, in which the trustees promised to combine the literary interest of the college with a decided support to evangelical truth and the promotion of an able and faithful ministry in the Dutch Church; that the funds raised in New York should be appropriated to the support of the theological professorship in the college, and to the assistance of poor and pious young men preparing for the ministry; that the trustees should hold the funds for the theological professorship, and should call the professor elected by the Synod as soon as their funds would allow; that a permanent board of superintendents be appointed by the Synod to superintend the theological institution, to aid the professor in arranging the course of instruction, to attend the examination of students in theology, and to be known by the name of 'The Superintendents of the Theological Institution in Queen's College;' that the Synod provide money for a library; and both parties were to unite in erecting the necessary buildings, money even, if needed for this purpose, to be taken from the professorial fund.

"Synod now enjoined collections to be taken up in all their churches in the State of New York to help in the erection of the necessary buildings. It was resolved that the board of superintendents consist of nine members, three to be taken from each particular Synod, and three from the clerical members of the board of trustees.

"The effort to collect funds by the trustees met with unexpected success. The church of New York at once gave $10,000, and the church of Harlem $400.

"In less than a year the trustees called Dr. Livingston as their Professor of Theology, according to the covenant, offering $720, and $220 additional as president of the college. He at first declined the latter office, but ultimately accepted, a vice-president being appointed to take the burden of the duties. He did not immediately remove to New Brunswick, but waited until the churches under his care should be somewhat provided for, and also lest his removal might retard the increase of the professorial fund.

"In February, 1810, the trustees offered him $650 additional. He now, after a pastorate of forty years, and a professorship without compensation of twenty-six years in the city, at the age of sixty-four, broke all the ties he had there formed and removed to New Brunswick. He had given his professional certificate up to this time to about ninety students. By his removal he sacrificed a salary of $2500 in his pastoral charge. In December of the same year, considering the great sacrifices he had made, the trustees increased his salary to $1700, allowing also $300 for house rent, promising that if there were any deficiency it should be made up as soon as funds permitted.

"Dr. Livingston opened the seminary in October, 1810, with five students. But a few days before he left New York he wrote a letter to his venerable brother in the ministry, Rev. Elias Van Bunschooten, suggesting the propriety of his devoting a portion of his property to the benefit of the theological institution.¹ The effort was not in vain, but resulted in the endowment of the trustees in the sum of $14,650, which was increased by his will to $17,000. The income of this fund was to be appropriated to the support 'of pious youths who hope they have a call of God to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ.'² It at present exceeds $20,000, and has been the means of educating about one hundred and twenty-five young men for the ministry.

"In 1812, Dr. Livingston sent in his first report to the Synod, in which he briefly reviewed the facts, and stated the present condition of the seminary, urging the necessity of prompt and vigorous action respecting the endowment. At the same time the board of superintendents was fully organized by the adoption of a detailed plan respecting the government of the theological school. . . . From this time the board of superintendents has regularly met, and has examined more than five hundred students. . . .

"In 1814 the board of superintendents suggested to the Synod the necessity of another professor. To this end the church of Albany offered to contribute annually $750, and the church of New Brunswick $200 for a term of six years. Synod accordingly, to the great relief of the aged Livingston, the next year elected Rev. John Schureman Professor of Pastoral Theology and Ecclesiastical History. After his death, in 1818, the second professorship embraced the departments of Oriental Literature and Ecclesiastical History. Rev. Thomas De Witt having declined an appointment to this position, Rev. John Ludlow was chosen, who continued in this department for five years, when Rev. John De Witt was chosen his successor.

"The further endowment of the institution now weighed heavily on Dr. Livingston's mind. He felt that unless speedy measures were taken for this end the institution must die. In 1822 subscriptions were started, Dr. Livingston leading them with $500, and nearly $27,000 were subscribed within a year in the Particular Synod of New York.

"The Particular Synod of Albany now made efforts to endow a third professorship. Dr. Livingston saw this enterprise in its inception, but did not live to see it completed. He, however, lived long enough to see that success was certain, and that the institution for which he had sacrificed so much during forty years was established on a firm foundation. Different professors in different parts of the church had been appointed for the convenience of students, and Dr. Livingston had an assistant most of the time in New Brunswick; but it was only after his death, though in the same year, that the theological institution was fully organized by the full complement of professors, De Witt, Milledoler, and Woodhull. The Particular Synod of Albany, by the fall of 1825, had subscribed about $27,000 also for the endowment of the third professorship. It was several years before their moneys were paid in (some of the subscriptions indeed were lost), but in the mean time the church of New York for several years gave $1750 per annum, and other churches or friends assisted in meeting the deficiency. Synod now purchased the college building in payment of the obligation of the trustees to them. The trustees had saved the professorate in 1807 by taking it under their care, and the Synod now saved the college from extinction by a similar kindness. The theological professors became professors also in the college, and thus that institution, under the name of Rutgers, was reopened. . . . About 1861 the theological professors were relieved from further duties in the college.

"The want of a theological hall separate from the college building began to be seriously felt about 1851. Several young men were known to have gone elsewhere to study on account of the high price of board in New Brunswick. Elsewhere they could board in common. The students drew up a memorial stating their difficulties and their wants, and which paper passed through the hands of the faculty to the board of superintendents. The board took immediate action on it, and their efforts were crowned with complete success. At the personal solicitation of Dr. Ludlow, Mrs. Anna Hertzog, of Philadelphia, donated $30,000 for its erection, with the condition that it should be called 'The Peter Hertzog Theological Hall.'³ Col. James Neilson then gave a lot of ground valued at $14,000; Mr. David Bishop gave an adjoining lot, valued at $1200; Mr. Charles P. Dayton gave an adjoining lot, and $2000 were given by Messrs. Francis and Wessel Wessels, of Paramus, N. J., to purchase still additional land to make the rectangle complete. The building was speedily erected, and contained dormitories, refectory, lecture-rooms, chapel, and library. Since the erection of James Suydam Hall the professors have occupied lecture-rooms in it, and the library has been removed to Gardner A. Sage Library Building.

"In 1864 the Synod transferred the college property back to the trustees, and the next year the covenants of 1807 and 1825 were finally annulled. The money thus accruing was devoted to the erection of the beautiful professorial residences then in course of erection. The same year a fourth professorship, namely, of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology, which had been suggested and desired for many years, was by a very generous subscription through the churches secured, and Dr. David D. Demorest was elected to this position.

The Standing Committee on Peter Hertzog Hall, of which the three professors were members, reported in 1867 subscriptions and moneys received amounting to $62,233.09, of which what remained after the establishment of the fourth professorship was to be used for the building of three professorial residences, which now occupy the seminary grounds. The professors, as members of the committee, raised almost the whole amount, a work in which they were obliged to spend much time and labor. They were stimulated, however, early in the canvass by receiving from one person a subscription of $40,000 for increase of the endowment, on condition that a like sum should be raised for a new professorship.

Unfortunately, a large amount of the subscriptions could not be collected, although the subscribers had undoubtedly pledged their names in good faith. This caused embarrassment and rendered a new effort necessary. The Synod, in order to relieve the professors, in 1868 reconstituted the committee, making it up of nine laymen and one professor, selected by the faculty. The committee was authorized to employ an agent to obtain subscriptions and collect moneys. The Synod at the same time passed a resolution requesting the board of direction to co-operate with the committee in raising $100,000 for completing the endowment of the seminary and for the payment of the debt of the Synod. The committee and board jointly employed Rev. Dr. James A. H. Crowell as agent, who commenced the work with enthusiasm and vigor, and was cheered by receiving from Mr. James Suydam $40,000 for the endowment of the professorship of Didactic and Polemic Theology, to which he subsequently added the sum of $20,000. Very appropriately the Synod attached his name to the professorship. The committee has been continued with some changes to the present time, and has made its regular reports to the General Synod. Extensive improvements and repairs have been made to Peter Hertzog Hall. Water and heating by steam have been introduced into it, and its appointments are calculated to make an attractive dwelling-place. A rector has care of the building, who also provides meals at moderate rates to the students. James Suydam Hall, the noble gift of Mr. James Suydam, of New York City, has risen on one side of Hertzog Hall. It was dedicated (the General Synod attending) June 5, 1873, and contains a spacious gymnasium, chapel, museum, and four lecture-rooms. In front of it a bronze statue of Mr. Suydam has been placed by his friends, a well-deserved tribute to the memory of this liberal benefactor of the seminary, whose contributions considerably exceeded $200,000.

On the other side of Peter Hertzog Hall stands the Gardner A. Sage Library, a fire-proof building, erected by Mr. Gardner A. Sage, of New York City, presented by him to the General Synod, and dedicated June 4, 1875, the Synod being in attendance. In addition to his gift of the building, Col. Sage has paid the salary of the librarian, for the services of the janitor, for coal and other incidental expenses annually. He also contributed $2500 for the purchase of books, and $700 annually for several years for ordinary expenses of Peter Hertzog Hall, and united with Mr. Suydam in the purchase and presentation to General Synod of a professorial residence at a cost to each of them of $9000. Quite as valuable, perhaps, as these gifts have been his indefatigable personal services to the institution as chairman and treasurer of the Standing Committee.

Through the efforts of Dr. Cornell about $50,000 were secured for the library, chiefly in subscriptions of $2500. These moneys were given, not to be invested, but to be spent, as soon as it could be judiciously done, in the purchase of books. The larger part has been spent, and thus a good beginning has been made of an excellent library, which now contains over thirty thousand volumes. The selection of books is made by a committee of the General Synod, consisting of Rev. Drs. T. W. Chambers, E. T. Corwin, C. D. Hartranft, and Prof. Jacob Cooper, of Rutgers College, in connection with the theological professors. The library is open daily from 9 A.M. to 4.30 P.M., and is accessible to citizens of New Brunswick and others.

In 1873, Nicholas T. Vedder, of Utica, N. Y., presented to the General Synod $10,000 in railroad bonds for the establishment of a course of lectures to be delivered by a member of the Reformed (Dutch) Church to the students of the seminary and of Rutgers College on "The Present Aspects of Modern Infidelity, including its Cause and Cure." The lecturer was to be chosen by the General Synod by ballot. The Synod accepted the gift, and established the "Vedder Lectures on Modern Infidelity," which have been delivered yearly since, except in 1878, as follows:

1874, Rev. Isaac S. Hartley, D.D., "Prayer and its Relations to Modern Thought and Criticism."

1875, Prof. Taylor Lewis, LL.D., L.H.D., "The Light by which we See Light, or Nature and the Scriptures."

First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick.—Among the early settlers on the Raritan, including New Brunswick, Six-Mile Run, Millstone, Raritan, and North Branch, were many families of Hollanders or their descendants, who brought with them or inherited the customs and faith of the Fatherland. As those who came earlier in the colonization of New Netherland had established churches at New Amsterdam, Bergen, Hackensack, Acquackanonk, and other places in what are now Bergen and Passaic Counties, so these settlers on the Raritan made it one of the first objects of their care to found churches of their faith and form of worship in their immediate neighborhood.

Early in the last century there were no less than five of these churches situated upon the Raritan River and its branches, which through the agency of Governor Belcher received a charter of incorporation constituting their elders and deacons one body politic and corporate, by the name of the trustees of the Dutch Reformed Church of Raritan, North Branch, New Brunswick, Six-Mile Run, and Millstone, in the counties of Somerset and Middlesex. This charter is dated June the 7th, 1753.

The First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick, N. J., completed its one hundred and fiftieth year April 12, 1867. On the 1st of October following the pastor, Rev. Richard H. Steele, D.D., delivered a historical discourse, containing in addition to the history of the church much valuable information respecting the early settlement and progress of the town. That which relates to the general history of the town we have aimed to utilize in such places as have seemed to us most appropriate, and to condense under the present head that which belongs strictly to the history of the church, of course in all cases giving due credit to the author. We regret that this sifting detracts somewhat from the raciness of Dr. Steele's work, and that we have not space to embody the whole of his valuable and interesting matter.

"In compiling the history of this church," says Dr. Steele, "I have labored under the difficulty experienced in other quarters of the imperfection of early consistorial records and the loss of important documents. By diligent search I have recovered possession of a volume in the Dutch language which had been lost for upwards of thirty years, containing much valuable information. Some important facts are stated in reference to the origin of this church, as also that of Six-Mile Run. It contains the names of the first consistory, a complete list of the original members, a register of the additions to the church at each communion, and a full record of baptisms. The first entry in this volume bears date April 12, 1717. . . .

"The first building erected within the bounds of our congregation for religious purposes was about one mile and a half beyond the limits of the present corporation of New Brunswick, on the lot at the east of the burying-ground near the residence of Abraham J. Voorhees. Our knowledge of the organization is quite limited, and derived mostly from the traditions of the neighborhood. . . . There is in existence a subscription paper recently discovered, bearing the date of 1703, on which the sum of £10 16s. 6d. is provided to defray the expenses of a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church to be procured from Holland.¹ This church may have existed some years before that period, and was probably the first religious organization along the Raritan; for the great highway following the Indian path, as it is called in ancient deeds, from Inians' Ferry to the Falls of the Delaware, was the first point occupied by the Dutch settlers in this section of the State. The families represented in this list resided on both banks of the Raritan from near Bound Brook to New Brunswick, and along the route of travel to Rocky Hill.

"This congregation was known as the Church of Three-Mile Run. Its prominent elders seem to have been Frederick Van Liew and Hendrick Vroom. The building stood for upwards of fifty years, and was used for neighborhood services long after the project of making it a separate congregation had been abandoned. This church never enjoyed the services of a settled pastor, although two efforts are known to have been made to procure one from Holland, the first in 1703, and the second in 1729.

"In the mean time the town around Inlans' Ferry had grown into considerable importance, . . . and instead of completing their building at Three-Mile Run they wisely removed to this locality, and erected a larger edifice for the accommodation of the increasing population. This was the first religious organization in town, and owes its existence to the enterprise and foresight of that portion of the original congregation residing at this point and occupying farms along the Raritan River. The building was erected, according to an early map of the city, 'previous to the year 1717, but how long before is not known.' There are reasons for believing that it was built as early as the year 1714, at which time the place was beginning to assume some importance, and gave promise of considerable activity. It stood on the corner of Burnet and Schureman (then called Dutch Church) Streets, and at that date it was called the Church of the River and Lawrence Brook. The building fronted the river, and occupied the corner lot, subsequently and for many years in the possession of Dr. William Van Deusen. The structure was of wood, and, like most of the early churches, its breadth was greater than its depth. It was fifty feet broad and forty feet deep. There were seven pews on each side of the pulpit, and eight along the middle aisle. The total number of pews in the building was fifty, and the church accommodations three hundred. It was not completed until several years afterwards, and stood upwards of fifty years, giving place, in 1767, to the second church edifice, erected on the site of the one now occupied.

"The project of forming a church in this town did not proceed without some opposition. The old congregation at Three-Mile Run were reluctant to part with any of their members, and those families living still farther back in Franklin township urged the importance of all continuing in one organization. Several meetings of the church seem to have been held and the matter discussed, and on the 12th of April, 1717, 'in order to prevent disturbance and contention, and thereby to establish peace in the church,' the following plan was harmoniously adopted: 'That the church built near Abraham Bennet shall be considered as belonging to the church of Lawrence Brook and on the river, and that the members of the congregation residing in the neighborhood of Six-and Ten-Mile Run shall also build a church for themselves at either of these places, or at some point intervening, as they may agree.' It was also determined that the church at this place and at Three-Mile Run should each have a consistory, who should co-operate with each other, and 'notwithstanding these two places of worship the two congregations shall form one church, and in matters of great importance the two consistories shall meet as one body and transact such business as may come before them for the establishment of the Christian Church.' The agreement was not intended to be permanent, and seems to have been entered into out of respect for the older members of the church, who could not but feel an attachment to the first house of worship and the original organization. In a very short time this relation probably ceased, and all the services were held in the church of New Brunswick.

"In the old book of records, from which the above facts are taken, there is a decision that Roelef Seebring be the elder for the new congregation, and Hendrick Bries and Roelef Lucas the deacons. This number was soon after increased to three elders and three deacons, and the names of the following persons are recorded as constituting the first full board of consistory: Aart Aartsen, Izack Van Dyk, Roelef Seebring, elders; Johannes Folkerson, Hendrick Bries, and Roelef Lucas (Van Voorhees), deacons. Thus was organized the Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick, one hundred and fifty years ago.¹

"The register of baptisms begins on the 14th of August, when three children were baptized: Elizabeth, daughter of Johannes Soothof; Cornelius, son of Martin Salem; and Jan, son of Jacobus Ouke. During the three years of vacancy twenty-nine baptisms are recorded, but who occupied the pulpit during this period we have no information.

"We know that Rev. Bernardus Freeman, of Long Island, took a deep interest in this church, and through him early efforts were made to obtain a minister from Holland, in connection with three other churches already organized, viz.: Raritan (organized March 9, 1699), Six-Mile Run (organized 1703), and North Branch, now Readington (organized 1719). As the result of this combined movement there came to this country, commissioned by the Classis of Amsterdam, as the first pastor of this church, Jan. 1, 1720,

"REV. THEODORE JACOBUS FRELINGHUYSEN.—His name is one of the most honorable in the State of New Jersey, and the influence that he exerted among the early churches has given to this whole region the name of the 'Garden of the Dutch Church.'

¹ As this church is a continuation of the Three-Mile Run congregation, which had an existence as early as 1703, there is a propriety in the statements made in public documents that we trace our origin as a religious society to near the commencement of the last century, although we did not have a distinct organization until April 12, 1717. The consistory was sometimes ordained at Three-Mile Run, at least this is known to have been the case in one or two instances.

The field of his pastoral charge was very extensive, embracing all the churches in Somerset and Middlesex Counties. Very little information in reference to this pioneer of the gospel ministry in this section has been transmitted to us, which is the more surprising from the fact that his descendants have always lived in this vicinity, and have exerted a great influence in the political and educational interests of the State. Short biographical sketches have been published at different times, giving the few items of history which have been gathered from the personal allusions in the sermons which he printed during his ministry, and from the traditional knowledge of the inhabitants covering his extensive pastoral charge. To Dr. Abraham Messler and Rev. William Demarest the church is indebted for the valuable information which has been preserved of this most remarkable man.

"The residence of Dominie Frelinghuysen was within the bounds of this congregation, his grave is with us till this day, and as this was the centre of his charge his history properly belongs to the sketch we are giving.

"He was born in the year 1691, at Lingen, in East Friesland, now a province in the kingdom of Hanover, and was educated at his native place under the instruction of Rev. Otto Verbrugge, Professor of Theology and Oriental Literature. He was ordained to the ministry by Rev. Johannes Brunius at the age of twenty-six, and for about two years was the pastor of a church at Embden, in his native country. While thus engaged he received the call from the churches in New Jersey to labor in this destitute field. The circumstances of his selection by the Classis of Amsterdam for this important mission, as related by Dr. Thomas De Witt, indicate the hand of God in the gift of the first minister of this church. A pious elder entertained a young traveler on his way through the town to Embden to assume the charge of an academy in that place. During the evening he was so well pleased with the spirituality of his conversation and his eminent gifts, especially in prayer during family devotions, that he immediately informed his pastor, Sicco Tjadde, that he had 'found a man to go to America.' In answer to this call he made his arrangements to emigrate to this country, and arrived in the city of New York about the 1st of January, 1720, and on the 17th of that month he occupied the pulpit of Dominie Boel, immediately after which he came to New Brunswick and commenced his pastoral work.

"He brought with him from Holland, according to the custom of the church, a schoolmaster, holding also the position of chorister and 'voorleser,' Jacobus Schureman by name, the ancestor of this family in New Jersey. He was a well-educated gentleman and noted for his piety. He had the gift of poetry, and wrote several pieces, which are said to have displayed considerable genius as well as literary taste and cultivation. They were both unmarried and resided in the family of Hendrick Reyniersz, in the neighborhood of Three-Mile Run. He had been promised in his call five acres of land, which was increased to fifty acres on his arrival, with the use of a parsonage. Quite early in his ministry he was married to Eva Terhune, of Long Island, after which he resided at or near the residence of the late John Brunson. About the same time Schureman became his brother-in-law by marrying the sister of his wife, Autje Terhune, and resided near the farm which is known as the Schureman property. . . .

"At the time when Mr. Frelinghuysen commenced his ministry the churches under his care were in a most deplorable state. They had been entirely destitute of the stated ministry of the gospel since the first settlement of the country. . . . But he was a man equal to the times, of great energy of character, of large attainments in knowledge and grace, and with a certain fearlessness of spirit that enabled him to go immediately at the heart of the people. From the sermons which have been preserved we gather that he was a warm, earnest preacher, dwelling principally upon the necessities of the new birth, and having a dreadful antipathy to all manner of formalism. . . . He was charged by his enemies with preaching doctrines contrary to the standards of the church, and subversive of the whole spirit of the gospel. When he insisted on the necessity of experimental evidences as a qualification for the Lord's Supper he is represented as introducing customs contrary to the principles of the Reformed Church. A very elaborate pamphlet was published by his enemies in the year 1723, setting forth their grievances and making an appeal to public opinion against the course he was pursuing. The complaint is issued under the sanction of Simon Wyckoff, a deacon of the church of Six-Mile Run, Peter Dumont, an elder at Raritan, and Henry Vroom, a former deacon at Three-Mile Run. In addition to these names, the signatures of sixty-four heads of families are appended from all the congregations to which he ministered with the exception of New Brunswick. The controversy seems to have been quite bitter, and was continued several years. Indeed, it seems to have disturbed the peace of the church in some portions of his field during his entire ministry, becoming so violent that on one occasion the door of a church was shut against him and he was not allowed to administer the sacraments. As late as the year 1729 a party existed of sufficient strength to make an attempt to bring over from Holland a pastor more after their own mind. . . . But Dominie Frelinghuysen met all this opposition in the true spirit of a gospel minister, and was eminently successful at Raritan and New Brunswick in gathering together large congregations. Rev. Gilbert Tennent, who settled over the first Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick in 1726, and with whom Mr. Frelinghuysen was on intimate terms, in a letter to Rev.

Mr. Prince, a historian of Boston, in 1744, bore the following testimony to the services of his contemporary :

"The labors of Rev. Mr. Frelinghuysen, a Dutch Calvinist minister, were much blessed to the people of New Brunswick and places adjacent, especially about the time of his coming among them, which was about twenty-four years ago. When I came there, which was about seven years after, I had the pleasure of seeing much of the fruits of his ministry; divers of his hearers with whom I had the opportunity of conversing appeared to be converted persons by their soundness in principle, Christian experience, and pious practice; and these persons declared that the ministrations of the aforesaid gentleman were the means thereof. This, together with a kind letter he sent me respecting the dividing the word aright and giving every man his portion in due season through the divine blessing, excited me to greater earnestness in ministerial labors."

"The eminent evangelist, George Whitefield, paid frequent visits to New Brunswick, and preached to large congregations gathered from this whole section of country. He frequently speaks in his journal of the pleasure he enjoyed in the society of Mr. Frelinghuysen. He is very earnest in his praise, and represents him as a sound, fearless, and highly-successful minister. Mr. Whitefield, under date of Nov. 20, 1739, writes in his journal: 'Preached about noon for near two hours, in Mr. Tennent's meeting-house, to a large assembly gathered from all parts.' On the 26th of April, 1740, he again passed through New Brunswick, reaching the town about four in the afternoon, 'and preached to about two thousand in the evening.' 'The next day,' he adds, 'preached morning and evening to near seven or eight thousand people; and God's power was so much amongst us in the afternoon service that had I proceeded the cries and groans of the people I believe would have drowned my voice.' It was upon this occasion, according to the statement of Rev. Dr. Cannon, received from persons who were present, that Mr. Whitefield preached in front of the Dutch Church in Burnet Street, standing on a wagon, and the immense audience were spread over a meadow sloping down to the river, listening to the sermon."

Mr. Frelinghuysen was one of the originators of the movement for the independence of the churches in this country of the Reformed Church of Holland, and was a delegate with Hendrick Fisher, an elder of this church, to the convention in New York which drew up the plan for the "Coetus," an assembly of ministers and elders who should exercise jurisdiction over the American churches, subject to the supervision of the Synod of North Holland, in 1738. Hitherto cases of discipline had to be referred to the mother-church, and all ministers were required to be ordained and sanctioned by the Classis of Amsterdam before they would be allowed to preach in this country. The time had now arrived when the Reformed Dutch Church in this country had grown to sufficient strength and importance to manage its own affairs, and the action of the convention of 1738 was the beginning of a movement which soon grew into entire independence of the Reformed Church of Holland. Of course the measure was strenuously opposed by the church in Europe. The more aged and conservative of the ministers and elders in this country also vigorously opposed it, and organized the opposition known as the "Conferentie." "This was the beginning of a strife which has hardly been surpassed in the history of ecclesiastical disputes, and was not finally adjusted until Dr. John H. Livingston matured a plan of union in 1772."

Mr. Frelinghuysen was a thorough representative of the Coetus party, and exerted great influence in connection with this and other reforms. He saw that the interests of the church demanded an independent organization, with all the facilities of school, college, and seminary to provide a well-educated ministry. Although he did not live to see this result, yet he is justly honored as one of the originators of a system which at first greatly agitated but finally prevailed to the establishment and enlargement of the church. There were a few in this congregation who sympathized with the Conferentie party, but they never attained to any considerable strength.

On account of the accession of Dutch population from Albany between the years 1730 and 1734, and of families from Long Island, who continued to arrive and settle on farms along the Raritan on both sides, above and below the town, the increase and prosperity of the congregation became such that the completion and enlargement of the church edifice was demanded, and in 1735 the object was accomplished under the direction of a committee, of which Dirck Schuyler was chairman. The amount expended in reseating the church was about £200. At this date the pews were sold under an article of agreement, to which the names of the heads of families in the congregation were affixed. As a matter of general interest, as well as completeness of this record, we give them as they are found in the Appendix to Dr. Steele's Discourse:

several times mayor of the city, and held "an office which had been created by Mr. Frelinghuysen to meet the growing demands of his large charge."

MINNE VAN VOORHEES.—Perhaps no name was more prominent than this in the early church records. Dr. Steele calls him "the distinguished elder." He was one of the ancestors of a large family of this name in Middlesex and Somerset Counties.¹ He came to this vicinity from Long Island about the year 1715, and two years after, on the organization of the church, his name was placed on the roll of communicants. He resided at first on the property known as the College Farm, and was the proprietor of a large tract of land in that vicinity, including the mills below the city. Subsequently he removed to New Brunswick, where he resided till his death, which occurred about the year 1734. He was elected to the office of elder in the church when quite a young man, and was a ruling spirit in the congregation, being always a staunch supporter of Mr. Frelinghuysen. When the latter was exhausted by his excessive labors he would frequently call upon Mr. Van Voorhees to "take the evening lecture in one of the neighborhoods, and he would conduct the services with great edification. . . . His descendants were connected with some of the most distinguished families of the city,—the Pools, Neilsons, Abeels, Bennets, Schuylers, Van Deursens, and Hasserts."

In addition to the above, the Van Derbilts, Schencks, and Van Harlingens deserve mention as equally prominent. The list embraces the names of about one hundred heads of families, showing that in 1735 there was a large congregation here, built up under the ministry of Mr. Frelinghuysen.

In 1737 the plan of procuring a college was discussed at a joint meeting of the consistories held at Raritan; it was agreed to, and application was made to Holland, but no suitable assistant could be procured. In this emergency Mr. Frelinghuysen resorted to an expedient no less novel than it proved successful, that of appointing helpers, after the manner of the apostles (1 Cor. xii. 28), from among those most gifted in exhortation and prayer, and of the most exemplary Christian lives in his own congregations. The appointments were as follows: North Branch, Simon Van Arsdalen; Raritan, Hendrick Bries and Teunis Post; Six-Mile Run, Elbert Stoothof; New Brunswick, Hendrick Fisher, Roelef Nevius, and Abraham Ouke. These men held the office during

Among these names Dr. Steele makes special mention of the following:

JAMES HUDE was one of the prominent citizens of New Brunswick, and held in high esteem. His father was a Scotch Presbyterian, and fled from the religious oppressions of the Old World to enjoy the freedom promised in the New. Mr. Hude filled all the civil offices in the city, and spent most of his life in the service of the government. He was one of the judges of the pleas for eleven years, a member of the Assembly in 1738, one of the Council of Governor Morris, and for several terms mayor of the city. He was a man of great benevolence, and at his death, Nov. 1, 1762, the New York Mercury, in an obituary notice, speaks of him as "a gentleman of great probity, justice, affability, moral and political virtues." His residence was in Albany Street, in the house known as the Bell Tavern, the original part of which is one of the oldest buildings in the town. He does not seem to have been a communicant, but his children were all baptized by Mr. Frelinghuysen and appear on the church register.

PHILIP FRENCH was a man of great liberality and distinction. He came into possession of Indians' patent, and one of the streets of the city bears his name.

JACOB OUKE was one of the original members of the congregation and a prominent elder. He was

Of the events towards the close of Mr. Frelinghuysen's life Dr. Steele thus speaks: "In the summer of 1744 he bought of Daniel Hendrickson, of this city, a farm of two hundred acres, for which he paid £550. This property is located at Three-Mile Run, and is a part of the land occupied by the late John Brunson. Here he built a spacious house, a part of the foundation of which was used in the construction of the edifice now standing. At this place he probably resided at the time of his death,¹ which must have occurred about the commencement of the year 1748, when he had not yet reached his fifty-seventh year. He is buried, according to all the evidence we can gather, in the old yard of the Six-Mile Run Church, and a spot is still pointed out as his last resting-place."²

But his deeds live after him. When he came to this field he found it spiritually dead and uncultivated; when he was called away he left behind him a strong body of Christians and the savor of an example and life which exerted a moulding and ennobling influence upon a large circle of society. Tennent, Whitefield, Edwards, and Alexander speak of him as one of the great lights of the American church, the latter remarking, "If you wish to find a community characterized by an intelligent piety, a love of order, and all that tends to make society what it should be, seek it among the people of Somerset and Middlesex. And their present character is owing very much, under God, to the faithful preaching of the gospel under old Dominie Frelinghuysen."

Dr. Steele, speaking of the character of the children for piety, says,—

"We attribute this fact mainly to the piety and religious instruction of the mother, Eva Terhune. They were baptized in this church, and their names appear upon our register. Theodore was settled in Albany from 1745 to 1759. He is represented to have been frank and popular in his manners, earnest and eloquent in the pulpit, and blameless in his life. He sailed for Holland in the year 1759, with the expectation of returning to his field of labor. The date and circumstances of his death are not known. His memory was very precious in the church of Albany, meriting the tribute paid to him of 'the apostolic and much-beloved Frelinghuysen.'

"His second son, John, succeeded his father at Raritan in August, 1750, and died very suddenly while on a visit to Long Island, attending a meeting of the Coetus, in 1754. The third and fourth sons, Jacobus and Ferdinand, died on their return passage from Holland of the small-pox in 1753, and were buried at sea. They were promising young men, and had both received calls, the one at Marletown, and the other at Kinderhook, N. Y. The fifth son, Hendrick, pursued his studies in this country, was licensed by the Coetus, and in 1756 settled over the church at Wawarsing, Ulster Co. N. Y.; but in a short time he also died from an attack of smallpox, and was buried at Napanock. . . .

"One of his daughters, Anna, was married to the Rev. William Jackson, who for thirty years was the pastor of the church in Bergen; she died at the age of seventy-two, in May, 1810. And Margaret became the wife of Rev. Thomas Romeyn, whose only son, Theodore Frelinghuysen Romeyn, was pastor at Raritan, in the same charge of his grandfather and uncle, whose short and promising ministry of only eighteen months was brought to a close by his sudden death at an early age, amid the lamentations of a bereaved people.

"On the death of Mr. Frelinghuysen, the churches under his charge . . . immediately resolved to settle two pastors. Raritan, North Branch, and Millstone (now Harington) settled Rev. John Frelinghuysen, whose short ministry of only four years was eminently successful."

His death has already been referred to. During his short ministry he instructed a number of candidates for the ministry in a house which he built of brick brought from Holland, still standing in Somerville, where Hardenbergh, Jackson, and others pursued their theological studies.

The churches of New Brunswick and Six-Mile Run united in September, 1748, in extending a call to

REV. JOHANNES LEYDT, a young man who had just completed his studies. He was born in Holland in 1718, educated in one of the universities; came to this country with an older brother, settling first in the neighborhood of Fishkill, on the Hudson. The records of the Coetus held in New York, April 28, 1748, contain the first notice of him in these words: "The student Leydt, according to appointment, delivered a proposition upon 2 Corinthians iii. 6-8, and gave such satisfaction that he was likewise received with Van der Linde, to be examined in the morning, after reading the church certificate, from which it appeared that they had been communicants for some years." The elder Hendrick Fisher was a member of the Assembly, and presented a letter from the consistory of New Brunswick, "urging the speedy examination of the student, in order that their congregation, which was vacant, might employ him as a candidate, and, if satisfied, might call him." He was ordained; a formal call was extended by the consistories, Sept. 27, 1748, and he became the second pastor of the churches of New Brunswick and Six-Mile Run.

"The first act of the consistories was to provide him a home; accordingly they purchased a parsonage with fifty acres of land. This property was located at Three-Mile Run, and is known as the Skillman farm. . . .

"Very shortly after his settlement Mr. Leydt interested himself in procuring a charter from the royal Governor for the churches originally embraced in the charge of Mr. Frelinghuysen." This is the instrument alluded to at the commencement of the history of this church. The first trustees under the charter were the two ministers, Rev. Johannes Leydt and Rev. John Frelinghuysen, with the several members of the consistories of the five churches. The first meeting of the new corporation was held at Raritan, Oct. 31, 1753, when Hendrick Fisher, one of the elders of this church, was chosen president of the board, and arrangements were made to carry out the provisions of the charter.

Mr. Leydt was a popular and able minister, and soon gathered so large a congregation as to call for increased accommodations. "The old building on Burnet Street was full, and as early as 1754 the plan was agitated for the erection of a new and more commodious church edifice in a more central location." The subject, however, was postponed for several years. On the 12th of September, 1765, Philip French, Esq., a member of the congregation, conveyed as a gift to the consistory the plot of ground on which the present church stands. A building committee was immediately appointed, of which John Schureman was chairman, under whose management the new church was erected. It was completed and occupied by the congregation in the autumn of 1767, when the old church in Burnet Street was taken down and the lot sold to John Schureman. "The building was of stone, nearly square, and would seat comfortably four hundred persons. The cost of construction was £1097 13s. 7d. It had a front entrance on Queen (now Neilson) Street, and a side-door on Prince (now Bayard) Street. At the south side was a long pew for the accommodation of the public officers of the city, and on the north similar pews running parallel with the walls, which, it is said, were much sought after, 'as one eye could be directed towards the minister and the other to anything that might require attention in the other part of the house.' Far off and up in a circular pulpit supported by a pedestal was the minister, beneath the old time-honored sounding-board. Two pillars supported the roof from the centre, which went up on four sides, ending in a small steeple. A bell was put up about the year 1775, and the sexton in ringing stood in the middle aisle, winding the rope during service around one of the pillars.¹ The church was never desecrated with stoves, but in the midst of winter the good Dutchmen kept up what heat they could by an occasional stamp on the floor, and tradition says the dominie would keep warm by an extra amount of gesture."

The services in the church were held on each alternate Sabbath. Mr. Leydt was a laborious minister and a faithful pastor. He was a regular member of the Coetus, and a constant attendant upon the meetings of that body. On the erection of the General Synod he was associated with Dr. Livingston in conducting the principal part of their business, and at their annual meeting at New Paltz in 1778 he was chosen president.² Mr. Leydt was one of the prominent movers in the establishment of Queen's (now Rutgers) College. It was a measure designed to carry out the object of the Coetus; as that body had declared in favor of a ministry educated and ordained in this country, a college was necessary to educate them. Mr. Leydt, however, seems to have taken a wider view, and to have considered the general benefits of a college in relation to the State as well as to the church. In a letter to Dr. Livingston he says, "I humbly conceive that without a regular course of collegiate studies we shall never make any respectable figure in church or State." As soon as the college was chartered, in 1770, it became easy to settle the controversy which had been long pending respecting independence of the church of Holland, and hence the events were almost simultaneous, the approval of the church of Holland being granted the following year on condition that the Dutch Church in America should make provision in her constitution to provide herself with an educated ministry.

The pastorate of Mr. Leydt carries the history of the church through the period of the Revolution. He was a firm and earnest patriot, and took a warm interest in the struggle for independence. "He preached upon the topics of the day in such a manner as to rouse the patriotism of his people to a pitch of enthusiasm. He prayed for the success of the American cause, and counseled the young men to join the army."

During the time the British army occupied the town, the winter of 1776-77, services were entirely suspended. After the evacuation of the city, when the inhabitants returned to their homes they found everything in a most desolate condition. The work of destruction had been carried on indiscriminately and ruthlessly. It was a dark and discouraging time. But the people went to work to repair the havoc which had been wrought. "Our church edifice," says Dr. Steele, "underwent a temporary repair, and for some time was occupied on alternate Sabbaths by the Presbyterian congregation, the blackened walls of whose building were left standing below Lyle's Brook." Mr. Leydt was immediately at his post, and preached for his people two Sabbaths in the month of July, the first services which he had been able to hold in the city since the beginning of December. . . . Indeed, during the whole subsequent part of his ministry, which was brought to a close in 1783, the town was kept in a constant state of alarm. Mr. Leydt died suddenly of paralysis on the 2d of June, 1783, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, after having ministered to the church nearly thirty-five years. He had preached on the preceding morning, which was Sabbath, and about noon he was stricken down. His remains were buried at Three-Mile Run. None of his descendants are now living, although he left two sons, both of whom graduated from Queen's College and entered the ministry. Matthew was pastor of a church in Bucks County, Pa., and died Nov. 24, 1783. Peter was settled at Ramapo, Bergen Co., and died there June 12, 1796.

During the vacancy which followed the death of Mr. Leydt the pulpit was supplied by neighboring ministers. The next regular pastor was

REV. JACOB RUTSEN HARDENBERGH, D.D.—He received a call in October, 1785, but did not begin his ministry till the spring following, at which time he assumed the presidency of Queen's College. "His father, Colonel Johannes Hardenbergh, emigrated from Prussia in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and by purchase became the proprietor of a tract of land in Ulster County, N. Y., known as the Hardenbergh Patent. Jacob was born at Rosendale in 1738." He acquired his literary education at an academy in Kingston, and pursued his theological studies under the direction of Rev. John Frelinghuysen at Somerville. He was licensed to preach by the Coetus in 1757, when only twenty years of age. His preceptor dying suddenly, he was immediately called to succeed him in the pastoral charge, and in the month of May, 1758, he commenced his labors in the five united congregations of Raritan, North Branch, Millstone, Bedminster, and Neshanic. Of two of these congregations he was relieved in 1761. In this extensive field he labored with great fidelity during a period of twenty-five years. He remained at Somerville until the year 1781, his church having been burned by the British under Col. Simcoe in 1779, and was not rebuilt till 1788. On his removal from Somerville he served the church at Rochester, Ulster Co., N. Y., until April, 1786, when he came to New Brunswick, having received the double call of the consistory of the church and the trustees of the college. The high estimation of his talents and qualifications thus indicated was not disappointed. He labored with the utmost zeal and devotion, and drew around him a strong congregation, who loved and honored him, not only for his qualities as a preacher but for the influence he had exerted during the struggle for independence. He had shown himself capable of any sacrifice for the good of his country, and had suffered much personal loss and privation. He was the personal friend of Washington, whose headquarters during several months were within the bounds of his congregation at Raritan, and who uniformly attended his church, taking his seat at the head of the elders' pew. On two different occasions he was selected by the citizens of New Brunswick to deliver the oration on Independence Day, and with all classes he was eminently popular.

Being a man of slender frame and predisposed to pulmonary disease, his labors were seriously hindered by feeble health, but his zeal and energy never faltered. Among his last memorable acts was the procuring of a charter for this church on the 30th of March, 1790. It was incorporated in accordance with the general law of the State, passed at Perth Amboy Nov. 25, 1789, under the name of "the Ministers, Elders, and Deacons of the Congregation of New Brunswick," the seal of the corporation being the device of a burning lamp in the centre, and around it the words, "Dutch Church of New Brunswick."

Dr. Hardenbergh died on the 30th of October, 1790, in the fifty-third year of his age. The inscription on his tombstone, prepared by Dr. Livingston, is a beautiful tribute to his memory: "He was a zealous preacher of the Gospel, and his life and conversation afforded, from his earliest days, to all who knew him a bright example of real piety. He was a steady patriot, and in his public and private conduct he manifested himself to be the enemy of tyranny and oppression, the lover of freedom, and the friend of his country. He has gone to his Lord and Redeemer, in whose atonement he confidently trusted. He has received the fruits of his faithful labors and the reward of a well-spent life. Reader, while you lament the loss to society and his friends, go walk in his virtuous footsteps; and when you have finished the work assigned you, you shall rest with him in eternal peace."

"Dr. Hardenbergh was the last minister of this church who preached in the Dutch language. His plan was to use the Dutch in the morning and the English in the afternoon. From this date all the records of the church are kept wholly in English, and the Dutch passed away forever.

"His wife, who was known by the familiar name of the Juforow Hardenbergh, was distinguished as one of the most remarkable women of her day. She was the widow of Rev. John Frelinghuysen, and in maidenhood Dinah Van Berg, born in the city of Amsterdam, Feb. 10, 1725. Her father was a wealthy East India merchant, who reared his family in the midst of the fashion and refinement of the city, but she early gave up her mind to religion, and while still residing in her father's house her attainments were so marked and decided as to arrest the attention of all who knew her." Her naturally strong intellect was developed by her early education, and the vigor of her mind was seen even down to the period of old age. We regret that space will not allow us to give a somewhat extended sketch of this woman, of whom it is said that both "at her first home in Raritan and in New Brunswick she has left a name which places her in the highest rank of female Christians." Those who desire a fuller account of her are referred to the excellent discourse of Dr. Steele, which we have made the basis of this church history. We quote one passage given by Dr. Steele from her remarkable journal, wherein she relates her religious experience at the age of twenty-two. She thus commences: "It was the beginning of the year 1747, midnight had arrived and passed, and I continued in earnest supplication before the Lord, yielding myself anew to walk in his ways, and to cleave to his people. My heart went forth in earnest desire after larger measures of the renewing grace of the Holy Ghost. Oh, that old things might be made more fully to pass away, the power of depravity be brought into subjection, and the blessed image of the Lord Jesus be more fully transferred to me, and all things become new! My soul arose in petitions to God for the dear people of the Lord, both at my own place at Amsterdam and elsewhere, that God would grant them a renewal of his loving kindness and larger measures of faith. Oh, that the Lord would bring many of the people out of their darkness, that a formal Christianity might pass away, and the power of godliness be made again to appear! For God's ministering servants I also found in my heart to supplicate much assistance in their weighty work, that they might be more and more faithful and firm in their attachment to the cause, truth, and people of God, and be enabled by a consistent and godly walk to be examples to the flock."

She attained the venerable age of eighty-two years, departing this life at the residence of her son, Hon. J. R. Hardenbergh, in Water Street, New Brunswick, March 26, 1807. The following verse appropriately testifies to her exalted attainments, and is engraved on her tombstone:

"Tell how she climbed the everlasting hills,
Surveying all the realms above;
Borne on a strong-winged faith, and on
The fiery wheels of an immortal love."

"The children of her first marriage were a daughter Eva, who became the wife of Mr. Casper Van Nostrand, of Ulster County, N. Y., where several of her descendants are still living, and Frederick, the father of the late Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen. All who bear this honored name in our section of country are the descendants of Frederick, the only son of Rev. John Frelinghuysen, of Raritan."¹

"At the close of Mr. Hardenbergh's ministry the church was in a settled, prosperous, and harmonious condition. . . . As soon as the church could recover from the pain of their loss they sought a suitable successor, but were subjected to repeated disappointments. Dr. Livingston and Dr. Theodoric Romeyn were called jointly by the consistory of the church and the trustees of the college, but both declined. An effort was made to settle Rev. John Bassett, of Albany, in October, 1792, but without success. The pulpit remained vacant until Aug. 24, 1793, when a unanimous call was extended to Rev. Ira Condict, D.D., who accepted, and became the third pastor of the church. He had been previously associated with the Presbyterian Church, and on the Sabbath preceding his call had preached for the Presbyterians of New Brunswick, making so good an impression upon those who heard him from this church that his services as pastor were immediately sought for and obtained.

"Ira Condict was born in Orange, N. J., on Feb. 21, 1764. He received his academic instruction under Rev. Dr. McWhorter, of Newark, and became a student at Princeton College, graduating from that institution in 1784. He pursued his theological studies with Dr. Woodhull, of Freehold, Monmouth

Co., and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1786. For six years he was settled over the churches of Newton and Hardwick, Sussex Co., before accepting the call of this church. He commenced his pastoral duties here in November, 1793. He resided on Church Street till 1798, when he removed to a farm near Milltown, still known as the Condict farm. Dr. Condict excelled in pastoral duties and labors, while as a preacher he was studious, able, and scholarly. In June, 1800, he was elected president of the General Synod, and when Queen's College was revived he was chosen vice-president and Professor of Moral Philosophy. He was mainly instrumental in securing from Mr. James Parker the donation of the land on which the college building now stands. Connected with the revival of the college, and as part of the plan, was the removal of the theological seminary to this city in 1810. Dr. John H. Livingston, who had charge of the seminary, removed to New Brunswick that year, and also assumed the presidency of the college.

"Under the efficient labors of Dr. Condict the church steadily increased in strength, and with the growth of the population enlarged accommodations were again demanded." It was decided to erect a new building, and on March 11, 1811, the following persons were chosen a building committee: Matthew Egerton, Staats Van Duersen, John Clark, John D. Van Liew, and Michael Garrish. While the arrangements were thus being completed a cloud was thrown upon the enterprise by the sudden and unexpected death of the beloved pastor, Dr. Condict. The last sermon by the pastor, and the last in the old church, was preached on Sunday, May 20th, from a text which seemed almost prophetic of his approaching dissolution, although that event was entirely unanticipated by any of his people: "But I must die in this land, I must not go over Jordan: but ye shall go over, and possess that good land. Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God, which he made with you, and make you a graven image, or the likeness of anything, which the Lord thy God hath forbidden thee."—Deut. iv. 22, 23. It is said that during the delivery of the sermon the congregation was very much affected, and that many shed tears.

On Monday the work of tearing down the old church was begun. On Friday intelligence was received that Dr. Condict was confined to his house by a serious illness. Wednesday of the next week came, and his recovery was considered doubtful. On Saturday, June 1, 1811, he departed this life at eleven o'clock P.M. The scene of his departure was memorable, as he gathered his family and near friends around him and bestowed his last benediction and blessing.

The next pastor was REV. JOHN SCHUREMAN, D.D., a grandson of the schoolmaster who came from Holland with Dominie Frelinghuysen, and son of

Hon. John Schureman. He was born Oct. 19, 1787, near New Brunswick, his parents having retired to the country upon the occupation of the city by the British in 1776. His father was a member of the congregation, and a prominent patriot during the Revolution; his mother was a member of the Schuyler family, who came from Albany among the early settlers. In consequence of his father's absence in the public service his early education devolved chiefly upon his grandmother, to whom he was much indebted for his religious training. He became a member of this church in the nineteenth year of his age, being received into fellowship upon the profession of his faith under the ministry of his predecessor in the pastoral office in April, 1797. He had completed his literary course before the age of seventeen, graduating at Queen's College, Sept. 30, 1795. After studying theology with Dr. Livingston he was licensed to preach in 1800, preaching his first sermon for Dr. Condict in the old church. Thenceforth his career was brilliant and successful. He was for six years pastor at Bedminster, two years and a half at Harlingen, and two years settled over the Collegiate Church of New York. In the latter charge his health failed, and he came to New Brunswick, succeeding Dr. Condict as vice-president of the college. Thus, after a season of rest and recuperation, he was prepared to accept the urgent call of this church to become their pastor.

He has been regarded as one of the most useful and popular ministers of his day. Coming to his native town with the confidence and love of those who had known him from youth up, and with a reputation which had not disappointed his most sanguine friends, it is not strange that his settlement should have created his expectations as to his usefulness in his new field of labor. Nothing but failing health interfered with the realization of this expectation. Frequent hemorrhages of the lungs compelled him to resign in June after his acceptance of the charge, and he seldom after entered the pulpit.

The new church, whose corner-stone had been laid July 6, 1811, was finished and occupied Sept. 27, 1812. The dedication sermon was preached by Dr. Livingston, from Ezekiel xliii. 12, and the pews were sold on the 5th of January following. The cost of the building was $16,415, and was turned over by the committee to the consistory on the day of dedication entirely free from debt. The dimensions of the building are ninety-four feet in length, including the tower, which projects four feet, and sixty-six feet in width; it will comfortably seat eleven hundred persons. This building has stood, with its massive proportions, nearly three-fourths of a century, and has been twice remodeled,—in 1847 by lowering the galleries and erecting a new pulpit, and in 1862 by reseating and furnishing the entire edifice.

After his resignation, Dr. Schureman, in October, 1815, was elected a Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Pastoral Theology in the seminary at New Brunswick, and died in that office, May 15, 1818.

REV. JESSE FONDA was called after a short vacancy, Oct. 2, 1813, and was dismissed in order that he might accept a call from the Reformed Dutch Church of Montgomery, July 3, 1817. He was born at Watervliet, N. Y., April 27, 1786, graduated at Union College in 1806, and was licensed to preach by the North Consociation of Hartford County, beginning his ministry at Nassau, N. Y., where he preached successfully until he came to minister to this church.

"During the ministry of Mr. Fonda there was a healthy growth of the church, and at one communion twenty-eight persons made a public profession of their faith. The total number of communicants received into the church was one hundred and seven. Mr. Fonda continued the pastor of the church at Montgomery until his death in 1827. Few ministers excelled him as a preacher. He had a full, sonorous voice, well modulated, and would draw attention by the pleasantness of his countenance. He prepared his sermons with great care, writing them out in full, and then preaching from memory. He never paused for a word, but carried his hearers along in a train of rapid argument or pungent appeal to the close of his discourse."

Mr. Fonda left New Brunswick in the summer of 1817. In the graduating class of that year there was a young man, a member of this church, of great abilities and promise, to whom all eyes were immediately directed as a suitable person to fill the vacant pulpit. It was not necessary for him to preach as a candidate, for all knew him; and so urgent was the consistory that even before he had received his license a committee waited upon him with an informal presentation of a call. This student, who became the next pastor of the church, was

REV. JOHN LUDLOW, D.D.—His call bears date Sept. 17, 1817. The first invitation was declined, but on its renewal he accepted the charge, with the understanding that he was not expected to preach but once on the Sabbath during the first year, and be released from all pastoral labor. He, however, broke through these conditions almost immediately, and labored zealously, both in and out of the pulpit, for two years, at the expiration of which he was appointed to a professorship in the theological seminary, and resigned his charge as pastor.

His character and history are well understood in this community, where the last years of his life were spent in the education of young men for the ministry. After spending four years as professor under his first appointment by the General Synod, he returned to the pulpit, for which he had special qualifications, and was for eleven years pastor of the North Church at Albany, N. Y. In 1834 he accepted the position of provost in the University of the City of Philadelphia, which office he held for fourteen years, and only resigned that he might obey the will of the General Synod in his election to the professorship of Ecclesiastical History, Pastoral Theology, and Church History in the seminary at New Brunswick, succeeding the venerable Prof. Cannon, which position he filled with great ability until his death, Sept. 8, 1857.

The resignation of Dr. Ludlow left the church vacant for the third time in the short space of six years. Rev. Gabriel Ludlow, the brother of the late pastor, was called, but declined the invitation. The pulpit was supplied by the professors in the seminary for about one year, during which time the attention of the consistory was directed to another young student, and on Jan. 21, 1821, there was called as the eighth pastor of this church

REV. ISAAC FERRIS, D.D.—Dr. Ferris was installed pastor of the church on the third Thursday in April, 1821. The pastoral relation was dissolved in October, 1824, when he removed to Albany and became pastor of the Second Reformed Dutch Church of that city. He subsequently removed to the city of New York, where he was chancellor of the University from 1852 till the time of his death.

During the pastorate of Dr. Ferris seven young men who devoted their lives to the work of the ministry united with the church upon the profession of their faith. One of these was Rev. David Abeel, one of the most devoted of foreign missionaries. He united with the church on the 10th of November, 1821, and has been called "the beloved Abeel," on account of his gentleness and amiableness of temper. "His early death at the age of forty-two filled the whole church with mourning."

REV. JAMES B. HARDENBERGH, D.D., was the ninth pastor of the church, and the second minister of that name. He was called April 2, 1825, and remained in charge until December, 1829. Born in Ulster County, N. Y., he graduated at Union College in 1821, at Rutgers Theological Seminary in 1824, and was immediately after installed pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Helderberg, Albany Co., N. Y.

After his resignation as pastor of this church Dr. Hardenbergh preached in New York City, at Rhinebeck six years, to the First Church of Philadelphia four years, and then to the Northwest Church in New York fourteen years.

The property on which the church edifice stands was enlarged in 1823 and 1825 by the purchase of two lots of forty-three feet front on Bayard and Paterson Streets, with a depth along the alley of two hundred and forty-four feet, at a cost of $395.50. The first lecture-room owned by the congregation was erected in 1826 on the corner of the alley and Bayard Street, at an expense of $1468. All the weekly services of the church up to this date had been held in the Lancasterian school-room in Schureman Street. The church edifice was further improved by the erection of a steeple in 1827, under the direction of Staats Van Deursen, Matthew Egerton, and Peter Spader, the amount expended being $2725.

REV. JACOB J. JANEWAY, D.D., the tenth pastor, was called Feb. 23, 1830. He had previously been called to the Presbyterian Church of this city as the successor of Dr. Joseph Clark in 1814, but had declined. Previous to his settlement here he had occupied prominent positions in the Presbyterian Church, and at the date of his call had just resigned the professorship of theology in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa. Yet his early affiliations had been with the Reformed Dutch Church. His parents were members of the Collegiate Church of New York, into whose communion he was received upon profession of his faith after graduating from Columbia College. His theological studies were pursued under the direction of Dr. Livingston. Dr. Janeway served the church but one year, when upon his petition to the Classis the relation was dissolved, Feb. 24, 1831. After a short residence in the city of New York he returned to New Brunswick, and in 1833 was called to the vice-presidency of the college and to the professorship of Belles-Lettres and Evidences of Christianity, and filled the positions with eminent ability till he resigned in 1839. He died June 27, 1858, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

REV. SAMUEL B. HOW, D.D., was called to the pastorate of this church May 18, 1832. He was born in Burlington, N. J., graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1811, was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1813, and before his settlement over this church had preached two years for the church at Salisbury, Pa., five years at Trenton, N. J., two years as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick, seven years as pastor of the Independent Church of Savannah, Ga., and for a short time had been president of Dickinson College, Pa. He had resigned this latter position, and was engaged in a new enterprise in the city of New York at the time of his call to New Brunswick.

Under Dr. How's ministry the church of Middlebush was organized, March 17, 1834, of a part of the New Brunswick congregation living in that vicinity. In 1837 a noted revival occurred among the churches. One hundred and thirty-seven were added to this church, and about five hundred to all the churches of the city. The additions from year to year under Dr. How's ministry increased the number of communicants in the church to five hundred and forty-nine, according to a report made to the Classis. On Feb. 14, 1843, the Second Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick was organized. Rev. Dr. Demarest, now of the theological seminary, was their first pastor.

The failure of Dr. How's health in the winter of 1860 led him to seek rest from mental and physical exercise. June 14, 1861, he resigned his charge. During his ministry there had been received into the church five hundred and thirty-eight on profession, and two hundred and twenty-five by certificate from other churches. He had been pastor nearly thirty years, and the most harmonious relations had existed in the church.

The pulpit remained vacant until Dec. 3, 1863, when REV. RICHARD H. STEELE, D D., was installed, the sermon being preached by Rev. Dr. How.

First Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick, N. J.¹—The first positive date in the history of the church is A.D. 1726, when the Rev. Gilbert Tennent became its pastor. Its organization may have occurred previous to this settlement, but concerning this, for reasons which will appear hereafter, nothing can be stated with certainty. So far as can be ascertained, therefore, it completed the first fifty years of its history in 1776. On the year that the nation was born it might have celebrated its semi-centennial.

The records of the church during its first half-century are not to be found. The subsequent care taken on this point justifies the inference that records were made, but they are supposed to have been destroyed during the war of the Revolution, when the house of Dr. Moses Scott, a prominent elder, was entered and plundered by the British troops. For this reason our acquaintance with the history of this period is exceedingly meagre. The names of the founders, of the first officers, of the families originally composing the congregation are all wanting.

But while there is this obscurity in regard to the church, its first pastor, as is well known, was one of the most celebrated religious characters of his day, and his personal prominence brings his people into view. Moreover, through his correspondence and memoirs, even if names are wanting, we can learn something at least of their religious character and sympathies. It is as when we read general church history of the first two or three centuries. We see the colossal men here and there, and so through them and their writings the church.

It is needless to reproduce here with any particularity the well-known portrait of Gilbert Tennent. He was a man of great natural gifts, excellent mental training, ardent piety, dating from an early conversion, and with a zeal so abounding as to become at once his strength and his weakness. Son of a minister, William Tennent, Sr., himself celebrated, and with three brothers in the sacred office,—John, William, and Charles, each a conspicuous figure,—he easily surpassed them all in talents and influence, and in fact in these respects was second to but few men in his generation. Born to be a leader, he sprang with eagerness to that place at the front which others as willingly resigned to him. We read with delight of the piety of his brother William, which has undoubtedly left behind it a sweeter savor, but we find at the same time that in all public matters this saintlier spirit was content to follow where Gilbert showed the way.

Conspicuously associated with Gilbert in friendship and in labor was the celebrated George Whitefield, who during his visits to America came several times to New Brunswick, and on one occasion, April 26, 1740, preached in the open air to a congregation of from seven to eight thousand. A detailed account of these services may be found in Dr. Davidson's sketch, which want of space forbids us to reproduce. Copious extracts are also given from Mr. Tennent's narrative of his labors in New Brunswick, —the character of the truth presented, the serious and powerful impressions produced by it, the "melting seasons" enjoyed, especially on sacramental occasions, with other matters of a like nature. It is noticeable, however, that the best statement which can be made concerning this community, even during the period of the Great Awakening, 1740 and thereabout, is that "New Brunswick felt some drops of the spreading rain, but no general shower." In the same connection notice is taken of the character and labors of the good Dominie Frelinghuysen, first pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church, without abundant reference to whom no history, and especially no religious history, of early New Brunswick could be written. He and Mr. Tennent seem to have been kindred spirits in many things, and to have labored together for the spiritual welfare of the people.

A building was erected by the congregation in 1727. It was of wood, small and unpretentious, standing on Burnet Street, the west side, just north of Oliver, in the centre of the old Presbyterian burying-ground. From this ground the remains of the dead were removed now several years since and the space built over, with the exception of lot No. 140, so that no trace of its original use now appears. As nearly as can be ascertained, the building stood on lots 140 and 142.

Concerning this building, the accepted tradition has been that it was set fire to and destroyed by the British troops in their attack on New Brunswick during the Revolutionary war, a force of Americans under Capt. Adam Huyler having previously been dislodged from it. With this the statement upon the tablet in front of the present edifice corresponds, reading: "The First Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick was erected on Burnet Street, A.D. 1727, and was destroyed by the Public Enemy during the war of the Revolution."

Upon the substantial facts in this story no doubt has ever been thrown; the question which has since been raised, as to whether the destruction was partial or entire, may be of interest to the curious, but does not invite serious investigation.²

² The following statement in the excellent paper read before the New Brunswick Historical Society in December, 1875, by Charles D. Deshler, Esq., may throw some light upon the subject:

In connection with the labors of the Tennents and of Whitefield, with others of a kindred spirit, arose the first great controversy in the Presbyterian Church of this country, resulting in the disruption of 1741, not healed till 1758. The question between the two sides, the original "old" and "new" in Presbyterian history, was, briefly, whether revivals are to be encouraged or the contrary, and whether piety or education is the more important in the gospel ministry. In this statement, however, exactness is sacrificed to brevity, and it is not supposed that it would have been perfectly acceptable to either party in the controversy.

In this strife, as in almost all similar cases, there were faults on both sides. Of the New Side Gilbert Tennent was the acknowledged leader, "so completely the soul of the party," says Dr. Hodge, as quoted by Dr. Davidson, "that without him it would never have existed;" and his church adhered to him.

It is in this position that he makes so striking a figure in the religious history of the times. The impartial historian must set his approval upon him, in view of his refusal to be satisfied with a dead orthodoxy, his earnest efforts for a more aggressive religion, and his sympathy with the great revival movement which was then sweeping over the land.

"The Presbyterian Church in New Brunswick, before and at the opening of the Revolutionary war, stood on Burnet Street, on what is now the northerly corner of Oliver Street, below Lyle's Brook, and was built in 1726. A tablet in the present 'First Presbyterian Church' states that the old church on Burnet Street was 'Destroyed by the Public Enemy During the War of the Revolution,' and Rev. Robert Davidson, D.D., in his 'Historical Sketch of the First Presbyterian Church in the City of New Brunswick,' states that it was set fire to by the enemy and was 'consumed.' [P. 17.] But in the 'Book of Registry and Copy of Inventory of Damages done by the Enemy and their Adherents to the Inhabitants of Middlesex County,' [preserved in manuscript in the State Library at Trenton, No. 172] the inventory presented by the congregation does not state that the church was wholly 'consumed,' but that it was 'damaged.' The following is a transcript of the inventory:

"Ditto of the Presbyterian Meeting-House at New Brunswick, Exhibited by Captain Richard Gibb and others, a Committee of ye Congregation, viz., between November, 1776, and June, 1777:

"To damages done to the above said Meeting-House to ye am't of £400 £400.0.0.

"John Lyle, Junior, being sworn, saith that he was an Eye Witness to the British Troops and their Adherents damaging of the above said Meeting House.

JOHN LYLE, Ju'r.

"Sworn Oct. 4, 1782, }
before Nath. Hunt. }

"Joseph Vickers and John Voorhees, carpenters, being sworn, saith that they knew the above said Meeting House mentioned in this Inventory, and do adjudge the damages done to the same by the Enemy amounts to £400.

"Sworn before Nath'l Hunt, } JOSEPH VICKERS, Oct. 4, 1782. } JOHN VOORHEES."

More decisive is an entry in the records of the congregation, Jan. 19, 1784, as follows: "Agreed that John Van Emburgh and John Lyle be authorized to dispose, in the best possible manner, of the old church edifice, and erect a suitable fence around the lot."

Dr. Steele, in his Historical Discourse, already referred to, says, "The building was not entirely destroyed, but as the congregation contemplated removing to another part of the city, instead of repairing the old edifice it was sold to Mr. Hassert, who removed it to New Street and converted it into a dwelling-house. This building is still standing, and is now No. 21." [P. 62, note.]

This statement of course would not have been made except upon grounds presumably sufficient, but I have not been able to ascertain what they are.

As these difficulties increased, New Brunswick Church, which had at first been connected with the Presbytery of Philadelphia, was transferred to that of East Jersey (1733), and subsequently, when the Presbyteries of East Jersey and Long Island were merged in that of New York (1738), it was set off with several other churches to form the Presbytery of New Brunswick. Here we have the origin of a Presbytery which has exerted, in the course of its long history, a more commanding influence, perhaps, than any other in the body. There are older churches than ours now on its roll, but as ours furnished to it its name and the leading man, and through this man the very occasion for its existence, it has sometimes been called, it would seem not inappropriately, the Mother Church of the Presbytery. It gave the name, indeed, to that whole branch of the church with which it stood connected in the division. In the history of the times the terms the "New Side" and the "New Brunswick party" are constantly occurring as interchangeable.

Between this party and the Synod of Philadelphia—the Old Side—the Presbytery of New York occupied for a time an intermediate position. But in a few years, having endeavored in vain, while standing aloof, to effect a reconciliation between the contestants, it came into organic union with the Presbytery of New Brunswick, the united body growing into that Synod of New York which, in the reunion of 1758, outnumbered the Old Side three to one, and included within itself the best part of the vigor and piety of the Presbyterian body, being the stock largely from which the denomination has grown to its present imposing dimensions. And what congregation, therefore, among the four thousand and over of our communion occupies a position more directly in the focus of our early denominational history than our own? And its record here is one of which it may well be proud. If it must share with its past the charge of divisive measures and of a turbulent spirit, it is entitled also with him to the credit of standing fast for an earnest and spiritual religion in the very crisis of the struggle, and of giving an impulse to the cause of Christ in the direction of evangelical effort and experimental piety, which it feels to-day.¹ On this account it is all the more to be regretted that the early records are lost, and that the very names of the founders have perished.

In 1743, Mr. Tennent removed to Philadelphia, where he died in 1764, in the sixty-second year of his age. His career after leaving New Brunswick is a part of the general history of the church.

"Arthur who succeeded Tennent at New Brunswick." This is in accordance with an old tradition which assigns the pastorate between 1746 and 1751 to a minister of that name, Rev. Thomas Arthur; but, so far as any local knowledge goes, the matter is doubtful. In 1760 the minutes of the Presbytery show that a temporary supply was appointed; and arrangements of this character were repeated from time to time till, in 1768, Rev. Israel Read, who had some years previous been installed pastor at Bound Brook, was appointed to supply the pulpit regularly one-fourth of his time.

On this scanty diet the church entered upon and passed through the stormy era of the Revolutionary war, closing up what I have designated as the first period in its history. Through the patriotism and personal heroism of several of its members, among whom may be mentioned Cols. Neilson and Taylor and Dr. Moses Scott, it furnishes a brilliant page to the story of the war.

In January, 1784, when we first strike the solid historical footing which we have so long felt the need of (the records of the congregation, which have since been kept with great regularity, beginning at that time), we find the people assembled for deliberation; and whether there was on hand the shattered frame of the former edifice to sell, or simply its blackened foundations, a new building is at once resolved upon, and, to meet the wants of a growing community, a new location. Lots were purchased on Paterson Street, corner of George, a point which is still as central as any in the city, and where, after a lapse of ninety years, the surroundings are still of the most desirable character; and the work was almost immediately commenced. "In 1785," says Dr. Davidson, "the walls were up and under cover," though in some minor particulars it was two or three years before all was completed. The description continues: "The structure was convenient, though not so large as the present church. It stood a little below the corner of George, fronting on Paterson Street. It was built of bricks, painted yellow (the 'Old Yellow Church' it is still called by those who remember it). At the north end was a small, narrow pulpit; and square high-backed pews ran along the sides."

Some slight changes occurred from time to time, but the building remained substantially as it was first erected until it gave place to the new edifice in 1837. The pulpit, however, seems early to have become an offense in some eyes, for in 1819, at a meeting of the congregation, it was resolved "That the congregation proceed to erect, in the place of the one now standing, another pulpit of different form and construction, in consequence of many exceptions made to it by many speakers and various hearers as to height, depth, and contracted form."¹ One hundred dollars were appropriated to this object. Should the voice of criticism be lifted against the present pulpit to effect a similar change, a larger sum would probably be required.

The church found itself thus with a new building, but without means to pay for it. To obviate this difficulty application for assistance was made to the people of Boston and vicinity, and to facilitate the project a handsome recommendation, certifying to the patriotism of the congregation and their losses during the war, was furnished by Governor Livingston, and indorsed by Governor Bowdoin, of Massachusetts. Nothing came of it except thirty dollars in money, unless a "box of spermaceti," forwarded at the same time, was a contribution to the building fund instead of a consignment to a private hand. It brings the past and the present into very close sympathy to find this want of success ascribed to "the failure of several persons in the region of Boston, together with the uncommon scarcity of specie." Dr. Davidson gives the correspondence entire.

With the beginning of the new era, 1784, the Legislature was applied to for an act of incorporation, which was granted, and the congregation was invested with all the rights and privileges usually conferred in this way. The original trustees were John Neilson, Moses Scott, William Patterson, John Taylor, James Richmond, John Meyers, and John Lyle, Jr.

It was at about the same period again that attention was directed to the securing of more regular service in the pulpit. In 1786 the congregation relinquished its partial claim upon Mr. Read, and Rev. Walter Monteith was called to the pastorate, on a salary of £200 ($500). Mr. Monteith was a native of Scotland, and a man of ability. His sermons, it is said, were strongly doctrinal in character. He dressed in the old style, was dignified in his bearing, and greatly respected. The church prospered under him, though there is no evidence of great activity. He held the charge till April 22, 1794, when he resigned.

He was succeeded by Rev. Joseph Clark, who was installed Jan. 4, 1797, on a salary of £250. Dr. Clark died in office suddenly on Wednesday, Oct. 20, 1813, having served the church faithfully for sixteen years. The Sabbath previous he had preached from the text, "The time is short." His death, it is said, made a great impression. The whole city was in mourning. His remains lie in the yard in the rear of the church.

There are those in the congregation who still remember Dr. Clark and speak of him with interest, though information of him now must mostly be gathered at second-hand. Dr. Davidson's brief outline of his life and character is exceedingly interesting.

pit when completed was greatly admired, and when the second edifice was torn down was thought too good to be destroyed, and so was removed to the lecture-room. It stood there till the spring of 1875, when, having had its full day, it also gave way to the march of improvement. It had a kind of sacredness in some eyes to the last, and portions of it are still preserved as relics.

According to this, he was a man of the old style, like Mr. Monteith, in dress and manner. His preaching was very impressive, particularly by reason of its emotional character. Few ministers have enjoyed to a greater degree the confidence and affection of their people. He exerted a commanding influence also in the church at large, and his counsel was greatly prized by his brethren. He left a church of one hundred and twenty-seven members, nearly double what it had been at his accession.

The choice of the people then fell on the Rev. Lev-erett F. Huntington, a young man from Princeton Seminary, who was installed Dec. 5, 1815. A high character for ability and piety is given him by those who recall his ministry. His services were particularly attractive to the young, and he interested himself greatly in the colored people of his parish, holding special services for them. These the remainder of the congregation were requested not to attend, but they would go notwithstanding.

During this pastorate, in the year 1816, the Sabbath-school was established. It appears to have grown out of conferences over the religious destitution of the city, had at the meetings of the Dorcas Society. "The ladies of the Presbyterian Church," says the record, "volunteered their services to collect children on the Sabbath for religious instruction." It was a school, like the original ones in England, for neglected children, rather than for those of Christian families. It is to this feature, no doubt, Dr. Davidson refers when he speaks of it as "organized on the modern plan," adding, "It was the first in the city." Miss Hannah Scott, a daughter of Dr. Moses Scott, and a lady of eminent piety, was the leader in the movement and the first superintendent. This peculiar indebtedness of the school to woman seems to have characterized it throughout its history. Woman's hand and heart have never been wanting to carry on the work, and its success is largely due to her instrumentality.

While the whole Sabbath-school work was of a missionary character at first, in 1828 a mission school was started, since known as the North Mission. Presbyterians were the principal movers in this, though members of other churches were associated with them. The character of the work at that day may be inferred from the fact that the ladies were constrained to take soap and towels with them, to put the children in decent outward plight before beginning the work of instruction. This mission has had a checkered history. It is now (1876) flourishing, under the superintendence of Mr. W. H. Gallup.

The Sabbath-school movement had the full approbation of Mr. Huntington, and the spirit of enterprise thus manifested by him, together with his singular sweetness of disposition and his faithfulness in embracing every opportunity to say a word for his master, gave hopes of great prosperity under his ministry, but these were speedily blighted by his death, which occurred May 11, 1820, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. He left a church of one hundred and fifty-five members. His remains lie by the side of Dr. Clark's.

Rev. Samuel B. How, D.D., was installed pastor in 1821. Dr. How was a native of Burlington, N. J., and a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania. He was licensed to preach in 1813 by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and ordained over the church at Lambertville. He then removed to Trenton, whence he was called to New Brunswick. Here he remained but two years, resigning in 1823, under a strong impression of duty to accept a call to Savannah, Ga. Returning from Savannah he became president of Dickinson College in 1830, passing from there to New York, from which point he was called to the First Reformed Church in New Brunswick in 1832. His long and successful ministry in this position (till 1861) is evidence that our people did not err when they judged him a suitable person to set over them in the sacred office. And tangible results of his labors among them were not wanting, though the term of service was so brief. He left a church of one hundred and sixty-seven members.

In 1825, July the 28th, a new pastor was installed, the Rev. J. H. Jones, a man truly the gift of God to the people. Under him the church immediately leaped forward on a new career. There was an immediate and decided advance in temporal things. A parsonage, the same now in the possession of the church, though since greatly enlarged, was built in 1827 at a cost of $9355; a new session-house in 1832, costing $2696; and, to crown all, the present church, dedicated to the worship of God Dec. 15, 1836, at a cost of $23,328.26. At the time that this last enterprise was undertaken the old edifice was still in a good state of preservation, but the congregation had considerably outgrown its dimensions, and on mature consideration it was determined that instead of being enlarged it should be entirely taken down and a new one erected. Improvement in style as well as capacity was thus secured, and by a slight change of location a front on George instead of Paterson Street, a change every way desirable.

In the midst of all this temporal prosperity there was spiritual vigor to at least an equal degree. Dr. Jones was a man of rare gifts, both in pulpit and parish, and his piety was of that devoted character which among an appreciative people is in itself almost an assurance of success. He had the hearts of his entire congregation, and their co-operation in all his efforts. Deep religious impressions were the result, and large ingatherings. In 1828 sixteen were added to the church on confession of faith; in 1830, nineteen; in 1832, thirty-four; in 1833, thirty-seven. The great work, however, was reserved to 1837, the year memorable in the annals of the church as that of the great revival.

The year following Dr. Jones resigned his charge, though with great reluctance, to accept a call to the Sixth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. He left amid the deep regrets of the people. His pastorate may be called, without disparagement to others, the palmy period in the history of the church. In thirteen years five hundred and three persons were received to membership, three hundred and thirty-eight by profession of faith, one hundred and sixty-five by letter. The membership when he left was four hundred and eleven.

In the Index of the Princeton Review, vol. ii., will be found an interesting biographical sketch of Dr. Jones, prepared by the Rev. George Hale, D.D., from which the following has been condensed :

Joseph Huntington Jones was born in Coventry, Conn., Aug. 24, 1797. He graduated at Harvard University in 1817, with George Bancroft, Caleb Cushing, Stephen H. Tyng, and other men of mark. While at the university he was at one time in great danger of being led astray by the erroneous teachings of the Unitarians, but he was saved through influences in which the warnings and instructions of a praying mother—a woman of great force of character, as well as of piety—bore no small part. After taking his degree, Mr. Jones was for a time tutor in Bowdoin College, Maine. Then, feeling that “necessity was laid upon him” to preach the gospel, he entered upon a course of study for this purpose, completing it at Princeton Seminary, where he spent one year, 1823–24. He was licensed to preach Sept. 19, 1822, at Braintree, Bradford Co., Pa., by the Presbytery of Susquehanna, and was ordained by the same Presbytery as an evangelist at Wilkesbarre, Pa., April 29, 1824. In June of the same year he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Woodbury, N. J. Here he found a church almost extinct, steps having already been taken to dissolve it, but by his earnest labors, blessed of God, new life was infused into it; thirty-three were added to the roll of communicants in a single year, and the whole moral aspect of the town was changed. From Woodbury he was called to New Brunswick, and from New Brunswick to Philadelphia, where he continued twenty-three years. Here again a feeble, almost dying church was reinvigorated, and large accessions were made to its membership.

He was a model pastor. Wherever he went the children, the sick, the poor were especially cared for. Though always in delicate health, and sometimes suffering deep spiritual depression, he was never idle. In 1861 he resigned his charge in Philadelphia, to accept the secretaryship of the fund for disabled ministers. In this work he had already been engaged for seven years without compensation. He now devoted his whole strength to it, with the same success which had attended his other labors, continuing without intermission at his post until his death, Dec. 22, 1868.

The congregation next enjoyed the ministry of Rev. Robert Birch, who was installed March 4, 1839. His pastorate was short, being terminated by death on Sept. 12, 1842; but it was long enough to win for him the high admiration of the people for his many excellent qualities both of mind and heart; and the sorrow at his death was sincere and general. His remains lie in the new Presbyterian cemetery, and the spot is marked by a handsome monument erected by the congregation. Dr. Davidson gives an account of his early life, as follows :

“Mr. Birch was the son of an eminent physician in the city of New York, and was born in January, 1808. While an infant he was attacked by a severe inflammation of the brain, and life was despaired of, inasmuch that his mother made his shroud while watching at his couch. He was only saved by a vein being opened in his head when he was apparently near dying, but he always suffered somewhat from the effects of this illness to the end of his days. At a very early age he lost his father, and with him his expectation of a liberal education. He was taken from school and placed in a counting-house. Becoming pious he was received to the communion of the Cedar Street Church, under Dr. Romeyn, at the age of twelve. The fatherless and sprightly boy attracted the notice of Dr. John Breckinridge, and was induced by him to resume his studies. Having graduated at Dickinson College he taught a classical school, first at Lancaster and afterwards at Savannah, where he made friends of gentlemen of the first distinction. His theological studies were commenced at Andover and completed at Princeton. After his licensure by the Presbytery of New York, he preached for a short time to a new church in a hall in Broadway, from which he was called to New Brunswick.”

One of the longest pastorates in the history of the church followed, that of Rev. Robert Davidson, D.D., who was installed May 4, 1843, with a salary of $1200 and the parsonage.

Dr. Davidson was born in Carlisle, Pa., on Feb. 23, 1808. His father, Dr. Robert Davidson, Sr., was for many years professor, afterward president, in Dickinson College, and for more than thirty years he combined with the duties of these successive offices those of pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Carlisle.

Robert graduated from Dickinson College in 1828, having previously made a profession of religion, and devoted himself to the ministry. He pursued his theological course at Princeton, completing it in 1831. In 1832 he became pastor of the McChord Presbyterian Church of Lexington, Ky., which he served successfully for eight years. He left it in 1840 to become president of Transylvania University, and from that position he passed in 1842 to the office of superintendent of public instruction in the State of Kentucky. In 1843, declining more than one invitation to a professorship, he accepted the call of this church. After leaving New Brunswick, from 1860 to 1864 he was pastor of the Spring Street Church in New York, and from 1864 to 1868 was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Huntington, L. I. Subsequently he resided at Philadelphia, busy to the last, so far as his strength would permit, with his voice, and especially with his pen, in the cause of truth. He died suddenly on Thursday, the 6th of April of the present year (1876). The circumstances were somewhat unusual. For some time previous he had been suffering from a complication of difficulties, confining him at times to the house. On this day he felt well enough to gratify a desire which he had long cherished to visit the Centennial Grounds at Fairmount Park. But he had miscalculated his strength. While he was upon the grounds the stroke fell, and he scarcely lived to reach his home. His funeral occurred at Carlisle, Pa., on Saturday, April the 8th, and from the biographical sketch prepared for that occasion most of the particulars given here have been taken.

A few more may be added mostly from the same source. He was for five years permanent clerk of the General Assembly, for twenty years a member of the Board of Foreign Missions, and for ten years preceding his death a director of the Theological Seminary at Princeton. The address to the graduating class of that institution this year had been assigned to him, and he had prepared it with his usual care. Death intervened, and the reading of it by another formed one of the impressive incidents of the graduating exercises. The year previous he prepared, by Synodical appointment, a centennial discourse, which was delivered in Philadelphia in October, and a copy of it was deposited in the corner-stone of the Witherspoon monument in Fairmount Park.

As these things indicate, he had great fondness for literary pursuits, for which the high order of his scholarship admirably fitted him. Throughout his life he made his influence felt scarcely less through the press than through the pulpit. The list of his published works is quite extensive, several being of a substantial character. To these were added numerous pamphlets and articles in the Princeton Review and other periodicals. His taste for historical research appears in his sketch of this church, and a similar one of the church in Huntington, L. I., and still more conspicuously in his "History of the Presbyterian Church in Kentucky," a considerable volume.

Dr. Davidson's own sketch of the church covers his pastorate for a period of nine years. In it modest reference is made to two seasons of special interest, one in 1843, when twenty-seven were received to membership, the other in 1852, when the additions amounted to thirty, mostly from the children of Christian families.

In 1852 a collection of $1500 was made for repairs on the session-house and the introduction of gas into the church. A year or two later a thorough refurnishing of the church was undertaken. The pews were recushioned, new carpets were laid, and with a single exception the interior was put into the condition in which we now find it. The single particular in which change has since been made, is in the ornamentation in the rear of the pulpit. Rich curtains of damask hung there till 1863, when they were taken down, and the present recess was let in.¹ The enlargement of the dimensions of the church was not considerable enough to require particular mention.

A few years subsequent to this Dr. Davidson found it necessary to seek temporary relief from his duties on account of failing health. Leave of absence for several months was granted him in November, 1856, the congregation providing for the pulpit. He improved the vacation by making a short trip to Europe, and Professor Green, of Princeton, supplied his place during his absence. He returned in season to participate in the revival scenes of 1858. During 1857-58, thirty-six were received on confession and eighteen by letter, mostly at the spring communion; during the succeeding year, thirty-seven on confession, seventeen by letter; fifty-four each year. Such a blessing and ingathering was a beautiful close to a long, happy, and prosperous settlement. At Dr. Davidson's request, the pastoral relation was dissolved in September, 1859.

A call was next extended to the Rev. John M. Buchanan, of Milwaukee, Wis., which was declined, and on Feb. 18, 1861, Dr. Howard Crosby, Professor of Greek in Rutgers College, was elected pastor.

Dr. Crosby was born in New York City, Feb. 17, 1826. In the midst of our centennial recollections it is interesting to note that he is a great-grandson of Gen. William Floyd, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He graduated at the University of New York in 1844; was appointed Professor of Greek in that institution in 1851; from 1852 to 1855 was president of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York; was appointed Professor of Greek in Rutgers College in July, 1859, and in the same year received the honorary degree of Doctor in Divinity from Harvard University. He was licensed to preach in October, 1859, and in 1861 was ordained and installed pastor of this church. In 1862 he resigned his charge, the trustees of the college objecting to his retaining it. In 1863 he resigned his professorship to accept a call to the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York, and in 1870 he was elected chancellor of the University of New York, the duties of which he has since combined with those of the pastorate, with rare success in each.

Dr. Crosby's incumbency as pastor of this church it is thus seen was brief, too brief for the wishes of the people, but it was a period of earnest effort. Every department of church work felt at once the vigor of his touch, and the future appeared to open brightly. Within the church he left behind him as a witness to his wise activity a people greatly stimulated and strengthened, and without the church one enterprise at least which deserves to be noted, the New Brunswick City Mission, organized largely under his influence, after which the City Mission of New York has since been remodeled. The income of this mission in 1861 was $303; in 1875 it was $1250, of which this congregation gave $300. Last year it was incorporated by act of the Legislature. It has always had some of its warmest supporters in the First Presbyterian Church.

Turning aside from the succession of pastors, we may note here the loss which the congregation suffered about this time by the death of several of its more prominent members.

In 1858 died Samuel Baker, for more than thirty years one of the elders of the church. He was born in the vicinity of New Brunswick, and passed most of his life in business pursuits in the city. His Christian character was one of rare consistency and purity, and he was unwearied in the discharge of all the duties of his office. His convictions of duty were clear, and he stood ready to illustrate them in his practice. Appointments to represent the church in Presbytery and Synod were regarded not as a hardship but as an important trust to be conscientiously attended to, and neither distance of the place of meeting nor difficulty of access deterred him from attending. He was for many years the almoner of the church's charity, a position which he filled with equal faithfulness and delicacy. He was greatly endeared to his associates in office, who hold his memory precious.

Hon. Littleton Kirkpatrick, long an honored citizen of the community and member of the congregation, died suddenly at Saratoga, Aug. 15, 1859. He was born in this city Oct. 19, 1797, and was the oldest son of Chief Justice Kirkpatrick, so highly distinguished in his generation. Graduating at Princeton College, he studied law in the city of Washington, returning to enter upon the practice of the same in his native city. He was successively member of the State Legislature, mayor of New Brunswick, and representative in Congress. At the expiration of his term in Congress he retired from public life, but not from useful activities. On the death of his father, Chief Justice Kirkpatrick, he was chosen to succeed him as a member of the board of trustees of this church, in which office he continued for twenty-five years. He was greatly interested in the prosperity of the congregation, and his mature judgment had a decided influence in shaping its affairs. At the same time, from the means which Providence had bestowed upon him, he was always ready to respond to a call for its pecuniary support, or to assist in its benevolent operations.

His personal character is depicted by his pastor, Rev. Dr. Davidson, in the following words: "An unending rectitude is said by those who should best have known him, to have characterized him from his earliest years. 'Is it right?' was the question he always asked, both of himself and others. No gloss or sophistry could blind his perceptions, and his abhorrence of duplicity gave even an air of sternness and severity to his judgments. He was a foe to all shams, hypocrisy, and deceit." Throughout his life he was reserved upon the subject of personal religion, but in March of the year of his death he made a public profession of his faith in Christ, and so it was subsequently felt God was making him ready for that sudden departure, then unforeseen but so near at hand.

Associated with Mr. Kirkpatrick in varied useful activities, and in the esteem of the congregation and the community, were the brothers James and Abram S. Neilson, sons of Col. John Neilson, of Revolutionary memory. They were soon associated with him also in death.

Abram S. Neilson departed this life on June 30, 1861, dying in the same room in the old Neilson mansion in Burnet Street in which he was born; and his funeral was attended in this house (the Presbyterian Church) on July 2d, just fifteen years ago to-day. He became a communicant of the church in 1844, and the following year was elected to the office of ruling elder, which he filled with characteristic faithfulness and efficiency. For ten years the minutes of session are recorded in his hand, as they had been for forty-three years in the hand of his father, and are now intrusted to one of the third generation in the same line. The following tribute to his memory was offered at his funeral by his pastor, Rev. Dr. Crosby:

"In this city, where every child knew him to love him; in this church, where his examples and efforts were felt and prized for a score of years, why need I describe the character of this saint? From my childhood it was my privilege to know him, and my testimony will be confirmed by all when I speak of his gentleness, his modesty, his kindness, and his liberality. His manner was winning to all. Although possessed of a sound mind and excellent judgment, he patiently listened to the opinions of others, and deferred to their wishes. He was eminently a man of peace. No one ever heard him utter a harsh or uncourteous word. He hid his own high merits behind his disinterestedness. . . . A father in Israel has fallen! Well may we mourn, for no one amongst us had won a more hearty confidence, a more profound respect, a more intense affection. But we know that Jesus has taken him to himself. On last Sunday week I had just prayed by his bedside, when he clasped my hand with great fervor and exclaimed, 'Precious truths! precious truths!' referring to Christ's presence and salvation, which had been the burden of the prayer. On Thursday last, when President Frelinghuysen and Dr. Davidson called upon him, he answered their inquiries regarding his trust in Christ with the firm words, 'Not a doubt—not a doubt!' Upon the day before his death he exclaimed in a distinct voice (almost the last words he used), 'My dear, blessed Lord and Saviour, come and take me to thyself, to be with thee through eternity.'"

If through these historical sermons such memories alone are preserved to posterity, the labors of those who prepare them will not be in vain.

Col. James Neilson, an older brother of the foregoing, was born Dec. 3, 1784, and died Feb. 21, 1862. He was a man not only prominent in his own community, but well known throughout the State with many of the public enterprises of which he was identified, contributing by his skill and energy to their success. He was a leader of men, not by showy but by solid qualities, exerting an influence when not appearing to do so. With quiet habits and unobtrusive manners he combined a rare power of discernment and great strength of purpose. Of the church he was the steadfast friend, serving it for many years as a trustee, and bearing with his brother no small share of its responsibilities. He was greatly interested also in the literary and theological institutions of the Reformed Church located at New Brunswick, and extended his benefactions to them. He was a Christian of consistent piety. The approach of death gave him no alarm; acknowledging himself a sinner, and resting all his hopes upon the person and work of his Redeemer, he resigned himself submissively to the will of God. Thus his death corresponded with his life, and he was laid to rest amid the regrets of the community.

Mr. John W. Stout, born June 15, 1790, died May 5, 1861, was also one whose loss was severely felt. He was a leading man in the business community, and this prominence reappears in his relations to the congregation, his steady friendship for which was an example to all. In the building of the new church especially he manifested a great interest, being one of the principal promoters of that enterprise. And on many subsequent occasions he was one of the first to put his shoulder to the wheel when assistance was required. His name does not appear on the roll of communicants, but it is believed that early education in another denomination had much to do with this.

Mr. John Acken, born Aug. 28, 1796, died May 5, 1862, was another who stood side by side with the men already mentioned, and his name naturally recurs with theirs. Success in business enterprises gave him large means, which were freely used for the support of religion, and high character gave him influence. His friendship for the church sprang from his love of it, and of that which it represents. In it were centred his hopes for this life and the next. He was long enrolled as a member, and adorned his profession by a life of exemplary piety.

In 1864 the eldership was still further depleted by the death of Josiah Ford, who had served in that office with great acceptance for nineteen years. He was a man to represent religion to others, steadfast, consistent, and faithful, and the influence of his example throughout his life as a Christian was felt as one of the conservative forces for religion in the community. Always in his place, and always ready to take his part in Christian duty, he quietly filled up his days with usefulness, and he left behind him, as it is believed he bore with him, a good record when the Master called him home.

From so many losses the session would have been greatly reduced, but meanwhile it had been increased by the election and ordination in 1858 of Dr. George J. Janeway and Abraham Voorhees, which was followed in 1864 by the election and ordination of Theodore G. Neilson, William L. Bogert, and William Rust.

Rev. William Beatty was installed pastor of the church June 2, 1863, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars and the parsonage. Rev. William Hamill preached the installation sermon; Rev. Mr. Yeomans, moderator of the Presbytery, gave the charge to the pastor, and Rev. Dr. Rogers the charge to the people.

Mr. Beatty graduated at Miami University, Ohio, in 1854, and studied theology one year at Danville, Ky., and two years at the Western Theological Seminary at Alleghany, completing his course in 1860. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Zanesville in 1859, supplied the Fourth Church of Pittsburgh during the summer of 1860, and was ordained and installed pastor of the church of Greencastle, Pa., by the Presbytery of Carlisle, May 16, 1861, from which place he was called to New Brunswick. His pastorate here continued about four years, when he resigned to accept a call to the Shadyside Church of Pittsburgh, Pa., where he still continues.

During his pastorate the records show decided activity in all branches of church work; one hundred and thirty-eight were added to the membership, eighty-three on profession, and within the same period the contribution to benevolent objects amounted to over thirteen thousand dollars. In 1866 the pew-rents were raised by a considerable percentage, and the pastor's salary increased in proportion, making it two thousand dollars.

March 2, 1868, Rev. A. D. L. Jewett was installed pastor. Dr. Jewett was born Jan. 12, 1830, and graduated at Williams College in 1852. His theological course was pursued at Princeton and extended through four years. Meanwhile he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Luzerne. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Reformed Church of Piermont, N. Y., by the Classis of Paramus, and continued there three years. Being compelled to resign by a temporary loss of voice, he connected himself with the Presbytery of New York. By that body he was sent to the church at Throgg's Neck to declare the pulpit vacant, and the result was the speedy filling of the vacancy by his own election to that post. He continued over that charge for seven years, when he was called to New Brunswick.

In 1868 extensive repairs were put upon the parsonage, and in 1870 the pastor's salary was increased to $2500. In the same year Hope Mission, a Sabbath-school on the west side of the city, was taken under the care of the church, and a building erected for it, costing, with the lots on which it stands, about $2500, part of which was raised by subscription and part carried as debt. The mission, under the superintendence of Mr. Jacob J. Janeway, has since enjoyed great prosperity, enlisting as teachers quite a large number of our communicants, together with others from our sister denominations, and reaching a considerable population remote from religious privileges. Exemplary enterprise has been shown in its management, both in the gathering in of attendants and in the conducting of the services.

Dr. Jewett had the gratification in 1871 of seeing the church complete its organization by an election of deacons. The following persons were chosen and installed: J. P. Langdon, D. C. English, Woodbridge Strong, C. S. Scott, F. R. Stout, and Andrew Agnew

Another change occurred in 1873, when, an increase in the eldership being deemed desirable, four additional elders were elected to serve for a term of years, subject to the action of the Presbytery. Since then rotation or term service in the eldership has been engrafted upon the constitution of the church in the manner prescribed by law, giving full sanction to the action here taken, at least in its general principles. Any adjustment of details which may be necessary to bring our practice into perfect accordance with the new rule can be easily reached in due time. The persons thus chosen were James P. Langdon, D. C. English, Andrew Agnew, and Charles S. Scott; and the same were re-elected in May of this year.

Dr. Jewett's labors during the latter portion of his term were interrupted by continued ill health. In April, 1873, a vacation of six months was granted him, during which his place in the pulpit and parish was ably supplied by Rev. Dr. John Woodbridge, now pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church. Failing to receive by this rest anything more than temporary relief, on the 16th of October, 1874, he requested a dissolution of the pastoral relation, which was reluctantly granted. He has since resided in Fordham, N. Y.

A call was then extended, Dec. 14, 1874, to the Rev. John Paxton, which was declined; and May 17, 1875, the present pastor, Rev. Thomas Nichols, was installed; Rev. Prof. H. C. Cameron presiding, sermon by Dr. Howard Crosby; charge to the pastor by the Rev. Dr. S. Hall, of the Presbytery of Newark; charge to the people by the Rev. Dr. John Woodbridge.

The brief period which has since elapsed has been partly occupied in inventorying the assets of the church, one result of which has been the taking of over one hundred and forty names from the roll, leaving, instead of a membership of four hundred and ninety-four, only three hundred and fifty. This is a work the necessity of which had long been felt, the roll being encumbered with the names of many absentees of long standing. A partial effort in this direction was made during Dr. Jewett's ministry. The bringing of the roll down to its actual number of communicants it is believed will not weaken but strengthen the church.

A reduction of a more grievous character remains to be noted. The past winter has been one of grievous losses by death. Who are to fill the places made vacant by the removal in this manner of James Dayton, Jeremiah Wilbur, and Lucius P. Porter, or the places which devoted Christian women, now gone, recently occupied? Here we acknowledge ourselves losers indeed; and if God of late has given us a few trophies of his grace, must not many more be received, and especially new devotion be kindled in all hearts, to make such losses good?

But the one hundred and fifty years of our history encourage us to implicit confidence. May we not say of our church, "God is in the midst of her." What we are to-day He has made us. How manifest His power and grace as the generations have come and gone! He was the God of the fathers, and will be of the children. What we fail of being and doing we must attribute to ourselves. We look out upon a future filled with solemn responsibilities. May we faithfully meet them, until we too shall be gathered to our fathers, and exchange the church on earth for the church in heaven.

Christ Church, New Brunswick.¹—The proceedings of the rector, wardens, and vestrymen of Christ Church, New Brunswick, previous to the year 1790, have not been preserved among the records of the parish. The only information that can now be obtained relative to its origin and early history is derived from the proceedings of the venerable society in England, which was established in the beginning of the last century for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts. By the bishops and members of that celebrated association the missionaries were sent out who ministered to the congregation until the period of the independence of the American colonies, and from their annual reports the materials are chiefly collected which form the first portion of this narrative.

The first reference that I have found to the existence of a congregation in New Brunswick is in the abstract of the society's proceedings for the years 1742–43, where it is stated that the "people of Piscataqua and New Brunswick are marking out a place for a new church about two miles distant from the old one." This must refer to St. James' Church in the adjoining parish, which had been built in 1722.

Mr. Skinner, the minister at Amboy, describes it as "a handsome wooden chappel," and says also "that the congregation grows daily, and in all probability will be as numerous as any in those parts."

The same missionary reports in 1744 that zeal for God's worship among the inhabitants had stirred them up to the building of a church in New Brunswick.

In the year following "the inhabitants of New Brunswick petitioned the society to send them a missionary, setting forth that they had erected a church of stone fifty-five feet long, forty-five wide, and twenty high, which may be of great service, not only to themselves but also to a well-settled country, extending many miles, in which many of the inhabitants profess themselves of the Church of England, and others who were formerly Dissenters seem now well-affected towards it; that the confidence they had in the most pious and truly Christian society that they would make them happy in an able, discrete divine to administer in that church put them upon building it; and they had obliged themselves and were ready to give proper security to raise £40 that currency per annum towards his support; and were persuaded that by the good behavior of such a missionary they should so far add to their numbers as considerably to increase that sum."

The society, well pleased with the laudable zeal of these gentlemen, acquainted them "that as soon as they shall have provided an house with some acres of land round it, according to the standing rules of the society, to the £40 engaged for the support of a missionary they will send one to be a resident with them." And in the mean time they commended them to the care of the neighboring missionaries.

In the society's report for the year 1749–50 it is stated "that the inhabitants of New Brunswick, having built a large and handsome church, raised £300 towards the purchase of a house and glebe, and obliged themselves to pay £40 per annum to the support of a missionary, earnestly pray to have Mr. Wood, a gentleman of very good life and conversation, bred to physic and surgery, admitted to holy orders," and sent to them in that capacity.

We learn from the proceedings of the next year that the Rev. Mr. Wood had been appointed missionary to the churches of New Brunswick and Elizabethtown. At the latter place he was able to officiate only every fourth Sunday, where, in his absence, the services of the church were performed by Mr. Chandler, who held the office of a catechist.

Mr. Chandler was then a young man, recently from Yale College, and a candidate for holy orders. He received ordination from the Bishop of London in 1751, and returned the same year. The chief sphere of his missionary labor was Elizabethtown, where he spent the greater part of his useful life, and where he died in 1790. His memory is still "green," and much revered in that venerable parish. But he is chiefly distinguished for the unremitting efforts he made to obtain from the home government the appointment of bishops for the colonial church. His efforts, like those of Bishop Butler, and of many other eminent men in the same good cause, did not succeed, in consequence of political jealousy and sectarian animosity.

The failure to accomplish this purpose has been always greatly lamented, and at first sight it appears most disastrous for the infant church in this country, which required the nurturing care and guidance of wise ecclesiastical rulers. The members of our church had no Protestant bishop within three thousand miles of them,—a case which, as Archbishop Secker said, “never had its parallel before in the Christian world,” yet the failure to obtain the episcopate, apparently so unfortunate, may have been owing not so much to the devices of designing men as to the foresight of a preventing, superintending Providence. If bishops had been appointed at the time, and they had acted when the Revolution occurred, like many of the clergy who came from England, who preferred their allegiance to the king of Great Britain to that of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and would not submit to the new government established, the effect would have been far more injurious to the church than anything else which afterwards happened. It seems a remarkable confirmation of this opinion that while at this time the opposition to the appointment of bishops came chiefly from New England, after the Revolution was accomplished the object so long desired was effected through the influence of Mr. Adams, the American minister with the British government. Thus in God’s good time the prayers and efforts of Chandler were crowned with success, and “the wrath of man was made to praise Him.”

Mr. Wood having removed to Nova Scotia, the society then “thought proper to fix on the Rev. Mr. Seabury, son of the Rev. Mr. Seabury, the society’s missionary at Hempstead, on Long Island, to be their missionary to New Brunswick, out of regard to the request of the inhabitants, and to the united testimony of the Episcopal clergy of New York in his favor as a youth of good genius, unblemished morals, sound principles in religion, and one that had made as good proficiency in literature while in America as the present state of learning there would admit of. Mr. Seabury, being of full age for holy orders, presented himself to the society from the University of Edinburgh, and upon examination being found worthy he was ordained deacon and priest, and soon after set out for New Brunswick, where the society hopes he will follow the example of his worthy father, and prove a very diligent and useful missionary in his station.”

“The Rev. Mr. Seabury, Jr., arrived happily there,” says the report, “on the 25th of May, 1754, and was received with a most hearty welcome from the inhabitants, who appeared very sensible of the society’s goodness in sending a missionary to them, and disposed to do everything in their power to show their acknowledgments. The church is a handsome stone building, which when finished will conveniently hold a large congregation, and this was proposed to be done in that ensuing summer; it is generally well filled, and as there was no dissenting teacher at that time of any sort, he had the satisfaction of seeing several persons of various denominations come to church, and he hoped they would in time, through the grace of God, conform.”

The grandfather of our eminent missionary was “a deacon,” and his father a licensed minister among the Congregationalists of New England. His father became a convert to the Episcopal Church (like some other prominent men of that day, including the rector of Yale College), gave up his Congregational ministry, and went to England for holy orders.

The son embraced the faith and the profession of his “worthy father.” After graduating at Yale College he pursued first the study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh, then he prepared for the work of the ministry, and was ordained by the celebrated Sherlock, Bishop of London, in 1753.

Seabury was of the purest Puritan extraction, his descent being traced from John Alden, “the first man that landed on Plymouth Rock.” But he found a surer footing on another “Rock,” that on which the church is built, and the chief effort of this “wise master-builder” here seems to have been to bring all Christian people of every name “unto that agreement in the faith and knowledge of God,” unto that conformity to the worship and order of His church to which he himself gladly submitted on his return home to the church of his fathers.

In 1756 the Rev. Mr. Seabury was collated to the cure of the church in Jamaica, L. I., of which he was inducted rector on the 13th of January, 1757.

In October of the same year he writes to the society: “I have constantly attended at Brunswick every seventh Sunday, and shall continue to do so, except the severity of the winter should render it impracticable.”

Under date of Jamaica, May 5, 1761, in another letter, he says, “When it was proposed to me to remove from New Brunswick, I was told it would prevent a good deal of uneasiness and confusion in the parish (at Jamaica), both with regard to the Dissenters and the professors of the Church of England themselves, who were unanimous in their desire of having me for their missionary; and as a further encouragement, it was represented to me that the people would do everything that could be reasonably expected to render my situation every way commodious. These motives, together with a desire of being near a most valuable and affectionate father, prevailed on me to solicit a removal to Jamaica.”

Mr. Seabury, with apostolic zeal, “went everywhere preaching the word,” and on one of these missionary tours an incident occurred which proved nearly fatal to the career of this celebrated man. While returning in a sail-boat from Brunswick to New York a sudden gust of wind arose which threatened to upset the little bark. The danger was increased by the obstinacy of the steersman, who would not or could not govern the boat. Mr. Seabury submitted in patience as long as it could be done with safety; at last he seized the helm, thrust the man away from it, and guided the vessel to the shore. A crowd of anxious spectators were gathered on the beach, who felt so indignant at the conduct of the helmsman, in exposing the life of the faithful missionary, that they laid hands on him as soon as he reached the land and inflicted the punishment he so richly deserved.

Mr. Seabury was thus providentially saved "from perishing by water," to become long afterwards the guide of the ark of Christ's church, which has been more than once preserved by his firmness and skill from the winds and storms that threatened her destruction.

To him more than to any other man, save good Bishop White, we owe it that she now lies moored in safety in the haven of peace.

Bishops Seabury and White seemed to have performed the same providential part in organizing the church in this country which Cranmer and Ridley did in reforming it in England.

"Opposite tendencies, widely differing views of party and doctrine, were to be reconciled and made to dwell in unity. This difficult result was obtained by the kindly co-operation of these two men, of very opposite constitutions of mind and habits of thought. By their mutual forbearance and concessions the happy mean between too much stiffness in refusing and too much facility in yielding was kept, and a result reached which, in the main, has continued to be satisfactory to all the classes of views which the American Episcopal Church harbors in its bosom. Bishop Seabury was the conservative element in the church, the firm opposer of needless innovations, of a latitudinarian theology, and a lax estimation and treatment of her peculiar principles. And it has been wisely said by Dr. Hallam that perhaps that church owes him less for what he did than for what he prevented from being done."

This truly apostolic man, who began his missionary work here, was consecrated the first bishop of the American church by the bishops of the church in Scotland, Nov. 14, 1784. Immediately after his consecration he entered upon his episcopal duties in the diocese of Connecticut, where he labored assiduously till 1796, when, on the 25th of February, his prayer for a speedy release was granted. "A voice from heaven was heard saying, Friend, go up higher," and he suddenly departed.

The church of New Brunswick by their letters, dated Dec. 20, 1757, return their thanks for the society's goodness to them in appointing the Rev. Mr. MacKean to succeed their late worthy missionary, Mr. Seabury; and write, further, "that it is with great pleasure they see the Church of England, by the benevolence of the society and the prudent choice they make of discreet men, raising its head in an infant country, where at its first settlement different sects, as well as Popery, had taken footing." And Mr. MacKean acquaints the society by his letter, dated Jan. 8, 1758, "that he arrived at New Brunswick on the 16th of December, and was kindly received by his congregation, and had officiated regularly to them from that time."

In 1761, Mr. MacKean reports that the congregation of the church had obtained a charter of incorporation. He remained in Brunswick until February, 1763, when he removed to Perth Amboy. There he died in 1766. On the tombstone erected to his memory he is described as "unshaken friend, and in every relation of life a benevolent and honest man."

He informs the society on his removal "that the Hon. Edward Antill, Esq., a man of most exemplary life and singular piety, has undertaken to read prayers and a sermon every two Sundays at Brunswick, and every other two at Piscataqua, till the arrival of a Missionary."

The society directed their thanks to be returned to Mr. Antill for his pious labors.

It is to be lamented that so little is known of the history of this zealous and devoted churchman. His papers, which were in possession of a nephew, were nearly destroyed in the great fire of 1835 in New York. He left three sons,—Edward, John, and Lewis,—the first of whom became a colonel in the American army and served in the war. On one occasion he was taken prisoner and confined on board the English fleet. Happily for him John, who joined the British ranks, was sent to examine the prisoners, and the first person on whom he cast his eyes was his own brother. He succeeded in procuring his release. Lewis also retained his loyalty, and fell in the battle of Brandywine. John survived many years, and died, it is supposed, in Orange County, N. Y.

There is a large and handsome marble font in the church, on which is inscribed, "The gift of John Antill, Esq., as a token of his affection to his native place." The tradition in the family, however, was that this font was presented by his father, the Hon. Edward Antill, as a votive offering in consequence of deliverance from imminent danger. He died Aug. 15, 1770, and his remains are now deposited under the floor of the church near the tower.

A joint letter from the clergy of New Jersey, dated Dec. 5, 1762, was received the year following, representing that the small congregation of Piscataqua have within a few years been at the expense of building a new church, and they earnestly recommend them to the society's favor. It was agreed to unite Piscataqua to the mission of Brunswick, which mission being vacant by the removal of Mr. MacKean to Perth Amboy, the Rev. Mr. Leonard Cutting was appointed to succeed him. This gentleman had for several years been a public tutor in the College of New York, and produced the most ample testimony to his character "for learning, piety, and virtue, and firm attachment to the present government in Church and State."

Under date of Oct. 3, 1764, Mr. Cutting gives a particular account of the state of his churches.

In New Brunswick, he says, there are about one hundred and thirty families, most of them in but indifferent circumstances. In this town are three places of public worship,—an English and a Dutch Church, and a Presbyterian meeting, the members of which live together in a friendly manner without disputes and animosities on account of religion. His own congregation seems to be composed of serious, zealous, and devout members, and is likely to flourish greatly. His communicants at present are about twenty-five. He catechises the children at Brunswick and Piscataqua every Sunday. The congregation at Brunswick have given a bond for £40 a year, Jersey currency, and allow £20 currency for house-rent till they are able to purchase a glebe.

Nothing is here said of the land on which the church is built, which was given by Philip French, Esq., in 1745. During the Revolution the deed was lost, and only found a few years ago in the garret of an old house in New York. There is no evidence that either house or glebe were ever purchased. If so, church robbery and sacrilege stand to the account of some poor soul.

In his report of April 29, 1765, Mr. Cutting "with pleasure observes that in New Brunswick the same catholic spirit prevails, all denominations living together in a friendly manner without disputes and animosities."

In Piscataqua, he says, the church is well filled, and the people appear serious and attentive.

During the next year this worthy missionary removed to Hempstead, L. I.; thence he writes that the church at Brunswick appears to increase in numbers, and there were thirty-four communicants.

The society now appointed the Rev. Abraham Beach to this mission, where he arrived safe in the end of September, 1767. He reports that he was kindly received, and found an agreement among all denominations.

In his next letter Mr. Beach informs them "that his own churches are frequented by serious persons of all denominations, and that he hath in his mission a great number of negroes, to some of whom he reads at his own house every Sunday evening."

In the proceedings of 1773 it is reported that the people of New Brunswick have by a subscription repaired the church and very nearly erected the steeple.

In 1774 "the Rev. Abraham Beach's mission is in a good state. He endeavoreth, by a kind and candid treatment, to overcome the prejudices of the Dissenters, and hath experienced the good effects of it in several instances."

During the following year Mr. Beach represents "how hurtful the American disputes are to the clergy, and assures the society that he has endeavored to promote moderation, peace, and good order, and trusts to Providence for the success."

Though Dr. Beach was, says his grandson, "liberal in his intercourse with his brethren of other denominations, it appears from his correspondence that he was tenacious of Episcopal ordination, and unwilling to accede, even as a temporary expedient, to the plan brought prominently forward in 1783 by Dr. (afterwards Bishop) White to organize the church and provide for the ordination of ministers without a consecrated bishop. Nor did he give a voluntary assent to all the alterations in the liturgy, and which, as the English bishops declared, went beyond the necessity of the case." In accordance with the advice of his friend, Dr. Chandler, he maintained "a firm and manly adherence to the true principles of the Church, a persevering activity in performing the duties of his station, together with prudence, candor, and good temper."

The last letter found among the proceedings of the society relative to this church was written by the Rev. Mr. Cook, missionary at Shrewsbury. It is dated at Brunswick, May 1, 1777.

This gentleman states that he was confined to the army, unable to reach his mission or to see his family. He reports that for the last four months he had been at Brunswick, and had officiated occasionally in the church, the only one in the province in which divine service was then regularly performed. He adds "that although Mr. Beach had, from his prudent and good conduct, been permitted to stay at home, he was not free from insults, and being nearly two miles out of the British lines, was in a state of constant apprehension."

At the time of the Revolution everything that bore the English name naturally shared the dislike extended to the English nation. When the nation was opposed and rejected, it was not to be expected that the national establishment would receive much favor.

The first missionaries of our church in this country were ministers of the Church of England. The church there is so closely connected with the state that they are very generally confounded together, and it is not wonderful, therefore, that when the government of the state was cast off the government of the church should be involved in the same fate.

This prejudice was aggravated by the fact that a great number of the ministers of the church at the time of the Revolution proved loyal to the parent country. In many instances they left their people and returned to Great Britain or her provinces rather than discontinue the public prayers for the king and the royal family. At their ordination they had taken the oath of fealty to the crown, and were ready to endure any degree of suffering rather than renounce their allegiance.

The Rev. Charles Inglis, rector of Trinity Church, New York, and afterwards the first Bishop of Nova Scotia, under date of Oct. 31, 1776, thus describes the sufferings to which most of the ministers of the church were at this time exposed: "The clergy were everywhere threatened, often reviled with the most opprobrious language, sometimes treated with brutal violence. Some have been carried prisoners by armed mobs into distant provinces, where they were detained in close confinement for several weeks, and much insulted, without any crime being even alleged against them. Some have been flung into jails by committees for frivolous suspicions of plots, of which even their persecutors afterwards acquitted them. Some who were obliged to fly their own province to save their lives have been taken prisoners, sent back, and are threatened to be tried for their lives because they fled from danger. Some have been pulled out of the reading-desk because they prayed for the king, and that before independency was declared. Others have been warned to appear at militia musters with their arms, have been fined for not appearing, and threatened with imprisonment for not paying their fines. Others have had their houses plundered and their desks broken open under pretence of their containing treasonable papers. Whatever reluctance or pain a benevolent heart may feel in recounting such things, which are indeed a disgrace to humanity and religion, yet they ought to be held up to view the more effectually to expose the baneful nature of persecution, make it detestable, and put mankind on their guard against its first approaches. Were every instance of this kind faithfully collected, says the writer, it is probable that the sufferings of the American clergy would appear in many respects not inferior to those of the English clergy in the time of the great rebellion."

Mr. Inglis himself, in reply to a message from Gen. Washington, requesting a change in the liturgy, that prayers might be omitted for the king and royal family, declared to the general in person "that it was in his power to close their churches, but by no means in his power to make the clergy depart from their duty."

Such conduct as this a man of Washington's firmness and valor was capable of appreciating. It did not diminish his reverence for the men, nor for the church of which they were ministers. He was himself, like many of our eminent patriots and statesmen, devotedly attached to it, partaking of her communion and serving as a vestryman; her ministers were chosen for his chaplains, and in her solemn forms of devotion he offered up his thanksgivings for victory or for peace.

It is not wonderful, however, that this loyal conduct of many of the clergy should have excited against them and the church the hostility of the multitude, and it cannot but be lamented that they should have taken this view of their duty, that they had not restricted themselves to the discharge of their clerical functions, and placed the service of Christ and His church before that of their king and country. By this course they would have better promoted the interests, temporal and spiritual, of all concerned.

But we, who live in peace and quietness, are hardly competent to judge of the conduct of men whose lot was cast in those days of trouble and confusion. It may be they foresaw that "the children's teeth would be set on edge" by "the grapes" of which "their fathers ate," and they forbore. At any rate, we cannot but respect men of such uncompromising principles, even while we pity their mistakes or condemn their errors. It is not just to charge their mistakes or their errors upon the church of which they were ministers, or to desert her altars because they would not desert their country.

This, however, has been the case in too many instances, and the church in this place has in times past shared the obloquy extended to her elsewhere. Political prejudices have kept great numbers from joining her communion, which to this day is denominated by some of the older inhabitants "the English Church."

During all these troublous times Mr. Beach remained at his post of duty, having a sweet homestead and retreat on the banks of the Raritan, where in the bosom of a large and happy family he found peace and solace amid surrounding perils, discord, and confusion.

He continued to officiate in Brunswick till 1784, when he became an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York. On resigning this office he retired to the old homestead, that mansion of hospitality, where his declining years were spent, and where he rested from his labors.

A tablet has been erected to his memory in the church, with the following epitaph from the pen of the late James A. Hillhouse, Esq.:

"In the adjoining church yard
He interred the remains of ABRAHAM BEACH, D. D.,

Who was ordained in London, in 1767, to officiate in this church, where he faithfully performed his duty for 17 years. After devoting 25 years more to his Sacred profession in the City of New-York, he returned to close his days amidst the scenes of his youthful exertions. Having completed his 88th year, he departed on the 14th of September, 1828, in the humble but assured hope of entering in the enjoyment of those promises, of which he was so long the Herald.

He was born in Cheshire Conn. Sept. 9th 1740."

On the same tablet are inscribed the names of Ann Van Wickle, the wife of Dr. Beach, who died in New York, Jan. 22, 1808, and of their daughters, Ann Chandler Beach, wife of the Rev. T. Lyell, who died Dec. 23, 1821, and Maria Beach, who, with her husband, the Rev. A. Carter, fell a victim to the yellow fever in Savannah, Ga., 1827. Another daughter, the venerable Mrs. Rattoone, on the 12th of October, 1848, was reunited to this happy family circle "in the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love;" and more recently the eldest daughter of Dr. Beach, Mrs. Isaac Lawrence, has been added to that numerous gathering in Paradise.

The Rev. Mr. Rowland immediately succeeded Mr. Beach in the charge of this church, and continued one year. He some time afterwards removed to Shelbourne, in Nova Scotia.

It appears that the church was vacant of a regularly settled clergyman till some time in the year 1787, when the Rev. George Ogilvie, a deacon, was engaged to officiate to the congregation.

He is described as "a man of fine personal appearance, an agreeable companion, an excellent reader, and an acceptable preacher." Mr. Ogilvie resigned his charge in the year 1790, and removed to Norwalk, in Connecticut, thence to Rye, N. Y., where he died.

After this period the proceedings of the rector, church wardens, and vestrymen of the church have been preserved on file, from which the following statements are chiefly derived:

In 1791 the Rev. Henry Vandyke, on the recommendation of the Rev. Mr. Beach, was chosen minister of the parish. The register does not state when his ministry terminated, but there is still preserved on file a letter from this gentleman to the vestry, dated at Burlington, June 20, 1794, from which it appears that he must some time previously have removed from New Brunswick.

In this letter Mr. Vandyke complains that his salary had not been paid him; that he was consequently "threatened by suits at law;" and he implores the vestry to save him and themselves from this "reproach and shame" by paying the balance due him.

At this time the lottery system was sanctioned by the State, and, unfortunately, it was introduced into the church. Some of the old tickets are still preserved. But, as in every such case, much harm was done, and very little good.

The church was defrauded of the money collected by some of the agents; quarrels ensued, lawsuits were threatened, and at last the clergyman's just dues were left unpaid. All such methods of obtaining money end the same way. The only true plan, and the only one that will prove finally successful, is the one enjoined in the gospel: "Let every one lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him; so let him give, not grudgingly or of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver." The deed that is not based on Christian motives will be "unblessed." It certainly will not benefit "him that gives," and seldom does it benefit "him that takes."

The parish seems to have continued vacant until May 4, 1799, when the Rev. John Henry Hobart was "invited to perform divine service for the congregation for one year," and "the sum of $266.67 was allowed for such services."

Mr. Hobart brought a letter of introduction from Bishop White to the Rev. Abram Beach, in which the bishop speaks of him as "a young gentleman who has lately entered into Orders in our Church, with the general expectation of all who know him that he will be eminently useful in it." How fully these expectations were realized need not here be said.

Mr. Beach forwarded this letter, which is still among the church records, to the vestry, recommending them, in consideration of "the young gentleman's character, as given by Bishop White, and the destitute condition of your church, to employ the Rev. Mr. Hobart."

In a letter dated at Philadelphia, April 10, 1799, Mr. Hobart accepts the invitation of the vestry, though he says, "The salary allowed will not be adequate to defray my necessary expenses; but I can make no objection, because I acquiesced in it when first proposed." The reason assigned for his removal from the churches in the vicinity of Philadelphia was "that he could not look on them as a permanent residence, and that he wished for some time longer to pursue his studies at Princeton, where he enjoyed peculiar advantages of books, of retirement, and of society."

After serving the church here a little more than two months, Mr. Hobart, in a communication dated July 15, 1799, says, "I have thought it my duty to state to the vestrymen my desire that they would release me from my temporary engagement with them for the last six months, to enable me to accept a permanent settlement," offered at Hempstead, L. I. He expresses, however, his "determination and wish to fulfill, to the best of his abilities, his engagement with the church here, unless regularly released therefrom."

On the very day after this was written he addressed another letter to the vestry, in which he says, with characteristic disinterestedness and magnanimity, "I think I shall not be satisfied in existing circumstances to receive a release from my engagement with your church, and I must, therefore, beg leave to withdraw my request for it. I shall accordingly answer the call of the church at Hempstead by informing them that my immediate acceptance of it is incompatible with my engagements and duty to the church at Brunswick. I would not wish to be understood that my determination has arisen from any view to a permanent settlement at Brunswick, but from a desire to secure the ease of my own mind, and to prevent any cause of censure, by the complete discharge of my engagement with your church, and so fully have I made up my mind, that I would not receive a release from my engagement were it to be offered me."

When this communication was laid before the vestry they appointed one of their number to express to Mr. Hobart "the pleasure with which they received it, and that though they would from views of advantage to him have consented to part with him, yet consulting their own feelings and the interests of the church they should have afforded that consent with painful reluctance."

In accordance with the resolution he had formed, Mr. Hobart did not leave the parish until the close of the year for which his services were engaged.

"I take this opportunity," he writes to the vestry, "of repeating what I shall always express with pleasure, that the attentions and kindness I have uniformly received from the members of the church here, lay claim to my respectful and grateful remembrance."

In another letter to Robert Boggs, Esq., clerk of the vestry, he writes in the same pleasing style: "Your good wishes are grateful to me. I look forward to the pleasure of often seeing you, and through life to the cultivation of your regard and friendship. My intercourse with you has been marked by acts of attention and friendship on your part, which are not less pleasing in the remembrance that they were acceptable at the time. Whatever may be the changes and trials of our state here (for who can expect unalloyed enjoyment), let me hope that we shall meet where our happiness shall be perfect and eternal." Exactly four months intervened between the departure of the two friends from this world of "changes and chances," and during the Easter season of last year the excellent and venerable Miss Maria Boggs, that mother of honored memory and name, joined the company of her husband and his friend.

On Mr. Hobart's resignation, "Mr. Beasley was invited to read prayers in the church until a rector could be provided," and in November, 1800, the Rev. Charles C. Cotton was engaged to take charge of the parish until Easter Monday following. He continued his services for six months afterwards.

At a meeting of the wardens and vestrymen on the 16th day of March, 1801, it was "Resolved and agreed unanimously, That the Rev. John Croes, of Swedesborough, N. J., be invited to accept the permanent rectorship of this church at a salary of $375 per annum."

The invitation given to Mr. Croes was made in conjunction with "the trustees of Queen's College," who desired to secure his services as a teacher. In this institution, which attained under him a widespread and justly-earned reputation, as well as in a school for young ladies, which was one of the most celebrated in its time, he labored with great assiduity and success. As a scholar and a disciplinarian he was admirably fitted for such a sphere of usefulness, and many of the most respectable and best-educated citizens of the place were trained and taught in the school of Mr. Croes. Influential, however, as he was in this capacity, the work of the teacher must have seriously interfered with that of the pastor. The parish could not but suffer when the rector was obliged to devote the greater part of his time and attention to scholastic pursuits. All this he frankly acknowledges and laments in his correspondence on the subject. By an express stipulation with the vestry the number of sermons he should preach was "limited to one a day." "I did this," he says in one of his letters on the subject, "not because I thought it too much labor to deliver two, but because I believed I could not prepare a sufficient number and perform the duties of the academy also. The business of the academy will so occupy my time that preaching more frequently than once a day would compel me to make greater exertions than my health would bear. Could the church afford support sufficient without the school, it would be my choice and delight to preach twice every Sunday."

What a sad pity that this "choice and delight" could not have been gratified through the liberality of the people he undertook to serve!

It is a common impression that school-teaching is peculiarly suited to the clerical office, and that clergymen are of all men best fitted to be instructors of youth. This cannot be denied, provided the instruction be of a religious character.

"Apt to teach" is one of the qualifications for the office. But "apt to teach" what? Not Latin or Greek or mathematics, not grammar or science or profane literature. We were not ordained for this, but to "teach all things whatsoever Christ hath commanded," and every other kind of instruction which interferes with this duty is forbidden by the terms of our commission. Of all men in this world the parish priest is the last man who should be the teacher of a school. In order to feed the lambs of his flock, as he is expressly commanded, to guide and instruct the children of his charge, he must gain their esteem and their affection. If they do not regard him as a father and a friend, if they cannot approach him with confidence and love, he can have no influence over them, and can do them little or no good.

Now they will rarely entertain such feelings for the man who sustains towards them the relation of a schoolmaster. In that capacity to be faithful the individual must exercise discipline, and sometimes apparent severity. And children will generally regard such a person with dread, if not with aversion. How then can they view him, for whom they entertain such feelings, in the light of a pastor, whom they should at all times approach with feelings of filial attachment! Thus a clergyman can hardly take a surer means of sacrificing the affection of the younger members of his flock than by uniting with his clerical functions the duties of the academy. Observation and experience confirm this assertion. Many of the most respectable citizens of New Brunswick have been heard to say that much as they esteemed Bishop Croes they never could overcome the feeling of childish repugnance they entertained for him as their former teacher.

Under these circumstances such persons never could have been drawn into the church; nay, they were absolutely driven from it, and who can deny that all this tended in no small degree to retard the progress of the parish during his lifetime? It must not be forgotten in justification of Dr. Croes, that he had no other alternative. The income offered him here was entirely inadequate to his support, and he was obliged to keep school, to his great regret, in order to secure a maintenance for his family, but it was undoubtedly for himself and his parish an unhappy and disastrous alternative. Who ever found profit in "muzzling the ox that treadeth out the corn"?

In November, 1801, Mr. Croes entered upon his duties as rector of the parish, and in the faithful discharge of these he continued until his death in 1832. During the long period of his rectorship but few events of note are recorded. In February, 1803, the spire of the church was struck by lightning and wholly consumed. The building itself was in imminent danger of being destroyed, and the excitement produced by it throughout the town was so great that to this day it is spoken of by the older inhabitants as one of the great events of the period. "When the fire raged with the greatest violence," says Bishop Croes in his account of this fearful scene, "and when the prospect of saving the building was almost nothing, a sudden squall of wind and snow commenced and blew the flakes, sparks, and burning timber in such profusion over the roof, and indeed over that part of the town between it and the river, that not only all hope was lost of the church but the greatest apprehensions were entertained for the town. The whole atmosphere seemed on fire. Houses one hundred yards distant were covered with sparks to such a degree that the roofs appeared like a mass of fire, and had it not been for the snow that fell in great profusion and the wet state of the houses no human exertions could have saved the town." By the contributions of the congregation, the citizens of the place, and some friends in New York and Savannah (whose names are all recorded in the parish register), the steeple was rebuilt in the course of a few months. In 1814 the whole interior of the church was remodeled. The pulpit was removed from the north side to the east end, a new desk and chancel were made, and the pews arranged to face them. The church was afterwards provided with "Venetian blinds for the east window, furniture for the vestry-room, a covering for the communion-table, and the two mahogany chairs by the generous donation of Mrs. Isaac Lawrence."

The general esteem entertained for Mr. Croes is shown by the fact that in 1815 he was chosen by the convention of the diocese the bishop of the same, and on the 19th of November of that year he received consecration from the hands of Bishops White, Hobart, and Kemp. He did not, however, resign his rectorship on this occasion, though he gave up the school and devoted his time thenceforward to the care of his diocese and of his parish.

In October, 1830, "in consequence of severe and protracted illness," the bishop summoned his vestry, and desired them to appoint as his assistant his son, the Rev. John Croes, offering to surrender to him the half of his own salary. The vestry acceded to the proposal, and Mr. Croes entered immediately upon his duties.

On the 27th of March, 1832, "the rector, induced by illness and an anxious desire to divest himself of the care of the rectorship, presented his resignation" of the same; the vestry, however, besought him to withdraw it in the following appropriate resolutions, which did them as much honor as it must have given their venerable pastor pleasure: "Whereas, the Right Rev. John Croes has presented his resignation to this board as rector, and whereas under any circumstances the vestry would deeply regret the dissolution of a connection which has existed in uninterrupted harmony between themselves and their esteemed rector, and which, as they think, has mainly contributed, with the blessings of Almighty God, to the preservation and prosperity of the church during so long a period, whilst they have witnessed with deep anxiety his severe and protracted illness, and would cheerfully contribute to the repose of his declining years, yet they cannot but think that the withdrawal by the rector of his resignation tendered to them would subvert the interests of that church which he has so long loved and so faithfully served; therefore, Resolved, That the Right Rev. Rector be respectfully requested to withdraw his said resignation." To this earnest request "the rector in his reply cheerfully acceded."

On the 30th of May this year the convention of the diocese met in Morristown. The bishop was too infirm to be present. His address was read by the secretary, from which the following extract is taken. It seems necessary to introduce it here as an illustration of the condition of the parish and diocese at that time, otherwise I would fain have kept back a document which cannot but excite in every generous mind feelings of shame and sorrow:

"Taking into consideration," says the bishop, "the probable injury the diocese may suffer from the want of an efficient Episcopal Head, I am strongly induced to recommend to you to take measures to elect some suitable Presbyter of the church as an assistant bishop, to perform those duties which I shall in all probability not be able to discharge. I am well aware of the obstacles that present themselves to this measure, especially that of the want of sufficient funds, as during the short time I may be permitted to live the withdrawal of or even diminishing the small stipend which has been steadily contributed by the church in the diocese in aid of my support would reduce my means of living much below what would be necessary for that purpose, especially as I have already voluntarily relinquished $300 a year of the salary I received as rector of Christ Church in New Brunswick (when the whole salary which I previously received was but $500), rather than suffer that church to be shut up and the congregation deprived of the services of the sanctuary. But as in all probability the obstacles I speak of will be of short duration, less than a year perhaps, it is to be hoped that some means may be devised to obviate it in the interim. At any rate I am assured, my brethren, that your sense of equity and propriety will not permit you to adopt any measure which may lessen my means of support or comfort during the short period I yet may live."

The convention did make then some "provision for his temporal wants," and a "committee was appointed to address a respectful letter to Bishop Croes, expressive of their grateful estimation of his long and faithful services, their affectionate sympathy in his sufferings, and their hope that he may be sustained under them by the Divine blessing."

It was well indeed that the aged prelate and pastor had "the Divine blessing to sustain him," for "vain had been the help of man." The good old man's days were happily drawing to a close, and in July of this same year he was removed from all earthly cares and entered into his rest.

Agreeably to the wishes of the family, the vestry had his body interred beneath the chancel in the church; they desired "to defray the funeral expenses, and in further testimony of their respect for the memory of their late rector they resolved to take measures to erect a marble tablet to record and perpetuate his great zeal for the church generally, and especially for Christ Church, New Brunswick, over which he presided for so many years as rector." A tablet was accordingly placed in the east end of the church, with this appropriate inscription, composed by his son:

"Beneath the Chancel are deposited the remains

RIGHT REVEREND JOHN CROES, D.D., first Bishop
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this Diocese.

Born in New Jersey, he held the office and performed the duties of A Christian Minister, in his native
State,

For more than 42 years, the last 30 of which were devoted To the service of this Parish.

On the 30th of July, 1832, he closed a useful life,
And calmly slept in the Lord, in the 71st year of his age
And the 17th of his Episcopate.

This Tablet

Is erected by his hereaved congregation,
As a testimonial

Of their grateful recollection of the many private virtues
Of their departed Pastor and Friend;

And of the high estimation in which they held
His piety and talents,

As a Minister of the Gospel of Peace;

And his consummate prudence, untiring activity,

As a Spiritual Overseer of the Church."

Bishop Croes was, in the truest sense of the word, "a self-made man." He had been in early life a soldier of the Revolution, and after the war "fought manfully under Christ's banner, His faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end." He pursued his studies diligently, and by the advice of his friend, Dr. McWhorter, an eminent Presbyterian minister of Newark, took orders in the church, which he lived to serve and govern with zeal and ability so many years. Though not famed for popular eloquence, Bishop Croes possessed many eminent qualities for his high and holy office. He was the laborious parish priest, the sincere friend, the judicious counselor, the watchful pastor, the instructive preacher, the thoughtful writer, the sound, well-read divine. He had the happy faculty of "speaking the truth in love," and he seems to have gained the esteem and affection of all who came within the sphere of his influence. To this day he is generally spoken of throughout the town by the name of "the good bishop."

On the 23d of August the vestry was convened, and chose for their rector the Rev. John Croes, the son of the bishop, and the late assistant minister. In October of the same year the convention of the diocese assembled in New Brunswick for the purpose of choosing a successor to their late venerable bishop and father. It resulted in the election of the Rev. George Washington Doane, D.D., rector of Trinity Church, Boston. He was consecrated on the 31st day of the same month, and with characteristic energy and promptness commenced his primary visitation on Wednesday, November 28th, at Christ Church, New Brunswick.

"I was induced," says Bishop Doane, "to enter on my official labors at this point that I might follow more immediately in the footsteps of my venerated predecessor, who for thirty years ministered in holy things to the people of that congregation. I was desirous also thus especially to acknowledge the friendly attention shown to myself personally, and the valuable services so long and faithfully rendered to the diocese by him who, bearing the name, has so worthily succeeded to the parochial charge of the lamented incumbent. It was the object of the discourse here and elsewhere delivered as the visitation sermon to set forth the plan of salvation through Jesus Christ, "the counsel of God," as St. Paul denominates it, the whole of which the Christian minister who would keep himself "pure from the blood of all men is bound to declare." And to the last day of his life this was the great theme of this great bishop's preaching, "Jesus Christ and Him crucified," the gospel of His grace, and the church of His love.

Mr. Croes continued in the rectorship of Christ Church until October, 1839, when his resignation took effect, according to notice given to the vestry in July preceding, to the great sorrow of many of his beloved parishioners and friends. He retired to a family residence in Keyport, where he undertook the work of a missionary, and finished his earthly course of labor in the month of August, 1849.

On his resignation a committee was appointed at the next meeting of the vestry, "with power to confer with the Rev. John D. Ogilby, and to secure his services temporarily for the church until permanent provision shall be made with reference to the rectorship."

Mr. Ogilby was at that time residing in New Brunswick, holding the professorship of languages in Rutgers College. He very kindly undertook the charge offered him, without any remuneration for "his acceptable services," until the 29th of October, 1839, when the present incumbent, the Rev. Alfred Stubbs, "was unanimously elected" to the rectorship.

At this time the congregation was small in numbers and in a state of great depression, for "the house had been divided against itself," and it was well-nigh "brought to desolation;" but being built upon "a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation," "all the building fitly framed and compact together" in the unity of the spirit, it soon began to grow with "living stones unto a holy temple in the Lord."

On the feast of St. Philip and St. James, the year following, the rector-elect was admitted by Bishop Doane to the holy order of priests, the candidate being presented by the Rev. John D. Ogilby; and in October of the same year, on the festival of St. Simon and St. Jude, he was instituted by the bishop into the rectorship of the parish.

On this occasion the bishop preached that admirable sermon, since widely circulated, and then by request first published, "On the Faith which was once delivered unto the Saints;" and it was one of the great sorrows of his life that a brother bishop, who was present, to whom he was ardently attached, and to whom the discourse was dedicated, not very long afterwards denied that faith, "quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est," and embraced a creed of modern invention, neither catholic nor apostolic.

Love of the church which the Redeemer purchased with his blood was the ruling passion of Bishop Doane's life, and a defection from her communion was in his estimation the saddest offense that man could commit. Alas, once and again, with a keener edge, did that sword pierce his loving and faithful heart!

During the rector's absence in the winter on a visit to the West Indies most acceptable services were rendered to the congregation by the Rev. Hamble J. Leacock, who afterwards became a distinguished missionary in Africa, where he died, leaving behind him the name of "the martyr of Pongas."

In his annual address to the convention in May, 1842, the bishop states that in his last visit to Brunswick he found a valuable organ had been presented by a former member of the parish, Charles M. Leupp, Esq., "as a memento of his affection to the church in which his infancy was trained and nurtured;" "and with this addition," says the bishop, "to the music of the public services there is, through grace, a constant increase of that harmony of heart which makes the church on earth most like the church in heaven, and best prepares its members for worship here and for enjoyment there."

The next incident of note in the parish occurred in the year 1846, when a valuable property was purchased for a parsonage. The purchase-money included the proceeds of a sale of lots which had been presented some years before by Mr. Edward Boggs and Mrs. Mary R. Blauvelt; the remainder was procured by subscription of different amounts from the members of the congregation and their friends. Chief among these should be mentioned the name of Frederick Schuchardt, Esq., who has been on all occasions the unfailing and generous friend of the church and its rector.

During the same year a large lot adjoining the churchyard was bequeathed to the corporation by Mrs. Mary Leupp, that saintly woman, of whom it was well and truly said by one who could appreciate her worth:

"So like Charity she lived on earth that doubtless,
Like Charity, she remaineth evermore in heaven."

On Aug. 1, 1850, the congregation being in a prosperous condition, the rector expressed a wish to retire, and proffered his resignation to the vestry. They appointed a committee consisting of Messrs. Wells, Hoffman, and Blauvelt, who in a letter overflowing with earnest and affectionate feeling urged him to remain in his present sphere of duty; as they were pleased to say, he had "triumphed over past difficulties, and his labors, through the blessing of heaven, would be crowned with entire success."

During this year efforts were made by the rector to organize an independent parish in Somerville. Frequent services had been held there in years preceding during the week and a congregation formed. The effort was successful, a zealous missionary was appointed, and on Sept. 4, 1852, the corner-stone of St. John's Church was laid by Bishop Doane. The beautiful plot of ground on which the church is built was presented by Joshua Doughty, Esq., who, with Richard Duyckinck, Isaac R. Cornell, A. Camman, and William Thomson, Esq., aided most efficiently in its construction and support.

The consecration next year is described in the bishop's happiest style: "I was joined on my way to Somerville by 'troops of friends,' till when we reached our place of destination we had already a congregation with us. Our zealous friend [Rev. John Rowland], the missionary, was ready for us, with his beautiful church adorned with gifts of love from numerous hands; the day was of the season's best; there was an assemblage that overflowed the building, and the noble service proceeded with as much of tenderness, devotion, and solemnity as any that I have ever shared in. How I thought of those missionary journeys, year after year, when 'two or three' were gathered in the court-house, and how I 'rejoiced for the consolation.' Altogether it was a day for the whitest stone, and I could forget many things that had past and were to come in the fullness of its spiritual joy."

The next year witnessed the consecration of Christ Church, New Brunswick. In his annual report to the convention the year previous the rector states: "Our old church has been taken down, with the exception of the tower, for the purpose of being enlarged, and our service has been celebrated meanwhile in a room kindly offered us by the trustees of the Presbyterian congregation." Every place of religious worship in the city was generously offered for the same purpose. In his next parochial report the rector proceeds to say, "The new building was completed in the month of August, and consecrated on the feast of St. Bartholomew. It is built in the Norman style, from a plan furnished by Messrs. Wills and Dudley, the work being superintended by John G. Hall, Esq."

As much of the old material as could be used was put in the new structure, stone of similar color being found in the neighborhood to supply what was wanting for the prolongation of the side walls. The present building consists of a nave fifty by seventy-five feet, with a chancel of twenty feet in depth and a south porch. It is admirably adapted for conveying sound; the officiating clergyman has only to speak in the ordinary tone of conversation to be heard in every part of the church. The interior is plainly but substantially finished, and the church retains its former venerable appearance.

The expense of these improvements has not much exceeded ten thousand dollars, and as the memory of the church's benefactors should never be forgotten, it seems proper to mention the names of the chief donors. Two sisters, Mrs. S. V. Hoffman and Mrs. R. J. Livingston, contributed five thousand dollars. To them belongs the praise of laying the foundation of this noble undertaking. Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Kinney, and Mrs. Hoffman presented the chancel windows, which represent our Lord's prayer in the garden, his crucifixion and resurrection. A side window was given by Mrs. I. R. Cornell, in memory of her grandmother, the late Mrs. Donan, who was also a benefactor of the church. Some friends of the lamented and "greatly beloved" Prof. Ogilby, who now sleeps within the church's shade, contemplate placing another memorial window on the opposite side. The ladies of the congregation united generally in furnishing a handsome carpet for the aisles and chancel, and Mrs. F. Schuchardt also supplied a complete set of new and elegantly bound books for the altar, lecturn, and desk. In addition to these three members of the vestry, Messrs. I. R. Cornell, F. S. Kinney, J. S. Carpenter, and the senior warden, S. V. Hoffman, Esq., contributed fifteen hundred dollars. The rest of the money necessary for completing the building was chiefly supplied by the legacy of the late Mrs. Clarkson, of New Brunswick, who bequeathed to the church a few years since one thousand dollars.

The main characteristic of the building and its chief excellence consists in its exquisite appropriateness. Every one who looks at it sees that it was intended for a church and for nothing else but a church, and as he enters within its porch the conviction is forced upon his mind and involuntarily escapes from his lips, "This is none other than the house of God."

The church being now fitted to accommodate a larger number of worshipers, many were added, through God's blessing, during the years ensuing, years consecrated by sorrows which swept with a desolating flood over that abode of peace, as much the people's as the rector's home, put out its light, and buried its gladness.

The heart of all was touched, and if the most generous sympathy could stanch such wounds there would have been no lack of healing balm and consolation.

The self-sacrificing bishop, who came with love's eager haste and a blessing on his lips to the house of mourning on that memorable Easter-day to perform the last sad office of friendship, was taken two years afterwards, about the same season, to his own needful and blessed rest.

By order of the vestry the church was draped in mourning, resolutions expressive of the loss they experienced in common with the whole diocese were unanimously passed and placed on record. Worthy of perpetual record and remembrance were the last words of this devoted servant of Christ, "I die in the faith of the Son of God, and in the Communion of His one Catholic and Apostolic Church. I have no merit; no man has; my trust is in the mercy of Jesus;" and if "the merciful shall obtain mercy," great will be the reward of that gifted "man of loves."

"His heart lay open; and by nature tuned
And constant disposition of his thoughts
To sympathy with man, he was alive
To all that was enjoyed where'er he went
And all that was endured.

He could afford to suffer
With those whom he saw suffer."

The toil-worn bishop now rests in that

"One inclosure where the voice that speaks
In envy or detraction is not heard,
Which malice may not enter,
Where no jarring tone intrudes," by the side of that dear church which was watered by his tears and blood, while the flowers planted by loving hands never cease to bloom on his grave.

As far back as the year 1852, when the enlargement of the parish church was in contemplation, the rector had occasion to say to the congregation, in furtherance of that design, "It is necessary that we should have larger accommodation than this building allows; there is a demand for pews which cannot be gratified; how then shall this demand be met? By one of two ways: either a new church must be erected in another part of the city, or the present building be made more commodious. The first is now impracticable. Sufficient funds cannot be obtained for such an object; and if there could be, the number of persons attached to our communion is not now great enough to justify the formation of another parish. At some future day this may be done, but the attempt under existing circumstances to form a new congregation would probably terminate in weakening and crippling both. The only practicable plan, then, for obtaining more church accommodation is to enlarge the present building, and we may hope to see the other purpose accomplished in the course of a few years."

It is well known that this appeal was instantly responded to by a contribution of five thousand dollars for the enlargement of the church, and from that time the other purpose was steadily kept in view. Many obstacles, however, interposed to hinder the work, and not until the lapse of several years could it be accomplished.

In the autumn of 1860 two members of the vestry, Samuel V. Hoffman and Robert J. Livingston, Esqs., offered the rector one thousand dollars towards erecting a mission chapel. Other members of the vestry and of the congregation followed the example, and in the course of a few weeks a sufficient sum was collected to justify the purchase of land and materials for building. Several citizens of the town not connected with the church kindly offered their aid; rich and poor united, and the contributions varied from one dollar to five hundred.

The corner-stone of the chapel was laid by the rector on Thanksgiving-day, Nov. 28, 1860. In it were placed a copy of the Holy Scriptures and of the Book of Common Prayer. A large concourse of people united with one voice in commending the work to the care and protection of Almighty God, the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost, in whose name the foundation stone was laid.

The plans and specifications were furnished by John G. Hall, Esq., a member of the vestry, and the carpenter's work, including chancel furniture, was executed by Edward B. Wright, a member of the congregation.

On the 28th day of December, 1861 (the feast of St. John the Evangelist), the building was ready for consecration, and on that day the solemn ceremony was performed by the bishop of the diocese, under the name and title of "The Church of St. John the Evangelist."

The ladies of the congregation zealously aided the enterprise, and under the direction of Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Swift, Mrs. Van Rensselaer, and Mrs. Johnson, by their work and contributions were enabled to furnish the chapel with carpeting, upholstery, and gas fixtures. The bell and the melodeon were the gift of Mrs. Littleton Kirkpatrick; Miss Mary R. Croes presented the font; Miss Kearney, books for the pews; Mrs. Frederick Schuchardt, the Bible and prayer-books for the lecturn and altar. A rich and beautiful set of silver vessels for the celebration of the Holy Sacrament were offered by Mrs. Robert J. Livingston "in memory" of her departed son.

The first minister appointed by the rector, with the sanction of the vestry, to aid him in this missionary work in the parish was the Rev. Louis Van Dyke, a deacon of New York. At the end of his term of duty the Rev. Alfred B. Baker, A.M., was appointed, who is still rendering most acceptable service. Mr. Baker had been ordained on the 5th of July previous, 1864, by Bishop Odenheimer, in Christ Church, together with Alfred Houghton Stubbs, A.M., the eldest son of the rector. The candidates were presented by the Rev. Robert Merritt and the Rev. Prof. Mahan, of the General Theological Seminary, who also preached the sermon.

It was an hour of grateful recollections that in which one who had been baptized, catechised, and confirmed in the same church was admitted in God's good providence to receive there a commission by his father's side to serve at the same altar and preach the same gospel.

"Spirit of light and truth! To thee
We trust them in that musing hour,
Till they, with open heart and free,
Teach all thy word in all its power."

The last ordained was the twelfth of the candidates for holy orders admitted in this parish during the present rectorship. Among whom may be mentioned Dr. A. B. Carter, Dr. Eugene Hoffman and his brother Charles, the two brothers, Edward and Samuel Appleton, the Revs. Benjamin Leacock, Henry H. Loring, Edward B. Boggs, James Chipchase, and John Cornell. Good Dr. Milledoler, son of the late venerable president of Rutgers College, was the first to begin and to "fulfill his course."

On the day before the consecration of the church of St. John the Evangelist, St. Stephen's day, the bishop laid the corner-stone of St. Paul's Mission Chapel at South Bound Brook, within the northern precincts of the parish. The rector presided at a meeting called for organizing this congregation in the district school-house, Oct. 6, 1861, when the primary election of wardens and vestrymen was made. This election was ratified at an adjourned meeting held on the 18th of the same month, on which occasion a handsome lot of ground was offered by Daniel Talmage, Esq., and accepted for the site of the church. Measures were immediately taken for building on a plan furnished by Duncan J. McRhea, Esq. There being no suitable room near to accommodate the congregation, an opening service was held in the building while yet incomplete by the rector on Septuagesima Sunday, 1863; and when the rector could not be present the services were conducted by Thomas L. Wells, Esq., who by the appointment of the bishop acted as a lay reader.

During this time the first funeral was solemnized within the new parish. One who took the liveliest interest in the good work, the wife of the junior warden, Capt. John S. Nicholas, U.S.N., and the mother of a daughter whose heart and life have been devoted to this mission, was called from her sphere of labor in the church militant. The absence of one so much lamented cast the only shade of gloom over that joyful morning of the consecration, the 6th of June, 1863, which was the brightest and sweetest of all summer days. Since that time the senior warden, the gallant Tunis Augustus Craven, found a glorious sepulchre in his ship while leading the attack on a fortress in Mobile Bay. The congregation in Bound Brook has sadly felt the effect of these bereavements. Capt. Craven was present at the consecration of the chapel, and in conjunction with his wife, Mrs. Marie Louise Craven, presented the rich silver communion service used then for the first time, in memory of their beloved son, Lieut. Augustus C. Craven, who fell likewise in his country's service from sickness contracted amid the hardships of military life. The altar, chancel furniture, and lecturn were given by their son and daughter, Charles and Mary Thomæ; the font was presented by the Rev. Edw. Anthon; the Bible and prayer-books by Mrs. Boream and Miss Mary Cornell; the melodeon by Mr. and Mrs. William Vail; and the stained glass for the window in the chancel by Mrs. Sarah Moran.

The Rev. James Thomson while at Somerville often held service at Bound Brook, and with the aid of Mr. John F. Blake and Miss Sarah Van De Water, who gathered in the children, formed the nucleus of the congregation. The church is now under the pastoral care and ministry of the Rev. William B. Otis, who has also in time past ministered most acceptably in St. James' Church, Piscataway. Here likewise occasional service has been rendered by the Rev. and venerable Robert B. Croes, the only surviving son of the bishop, whose honored name he bears. How pleasant to recollection is the name of another most faithful, devoted servant of God, who labored a while in that sweet country church, and now sleeps near the altar within its peaceful cemetery, the Rev. Isaac Smith, and the brief story of his guileless life and happy death cannot be told by the present writer in fitter terms than he has used already in a letter addressed to Bishop Doane, under date of April 20, 1855, which is published in the Convention Journal of that year:

"Good Mr. Smith has at length gone to his rest. He departed from all 'the ills that flesh is heir to' this morning at six o'clock. Happy dawn it was for him, for he woke to 'see the King in his beauty.' Mr. Smith had been confined to his bed for more than a week. I saw him on Wednesday, and made an appointment to administer the holy communion to him to-day, but a more glorious celebration awaited him; surely he is among that blessed company who are 'without guile before the throne of God.' A more childlike, gentle spirit I never knew. He always spoke of God as his father. 'My Heavenly Father is very good to me' was his frequent expression during his illness. He loved you deeply, and doubtless he has carried his love with him, and will not forget us where he is. May my soul rest with his!

"His most faithful and loving wife saw a change in his features this morning, and suddenly exclaimed, 'Lord Jesus, receive his spirit!' He looked steadily at her for an instant, and with a smile of thanks closed his eyes and died. He will be laid in his last earthly abode on Sunday afternoon. The spot which has been watered by the labors of such men as Bishops Seabury, Hobart, Croes, and John Ogilby, and now is to be enriched with the dust of this humble saint, will surely one day 'blossom as the rose,' desolate as it now seems to be.

Of souls that, infant-like, beneath their burden bend."

Missionaries of the church seem to have officiated at Piscataqua, or Piscataway, as it is now commonly called, as early as the year 1701. It was then styled "The Anabaptist Town, from about twenty that agree in that persuasion, the rest of the people being of all or of no religion." Since 1722 no less than three churches have been built there; one was destroyed by the violent tornado which swept through this region on the 19th of June, 1835. The present edifice was soon afterwards erected by the liberality of the late Joseph Foulke, Esq., of New York. He now sleeps within its churchyard, by the side of this noble monument to his memory. The church, unfortunately, has been for many years deprived of the services of a resident minister. Its most flourishing state was during the years 1839 and 1840, when the Rev. Dr. Fred. Ogilby, now assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, had charge of the congregation. It has since been dependent in great measure on such ministrations as the rector of Christ Church has had the opportunity to render. These have always been cheerfully given and gratefully accepted.

On Easter-even of the present year, while on the way to morning service, the appalling intelligence reached us of the assassination of the President of the United States on the evening of Good Friday. The national heart was strong in faith, and there was no appearance of consternation, but every face bore traces of sadness and grief. Men, women, and children were seen in tears, for each one seemed to feel that he had lost in the Father of his Country a personal friend or brother, so greatly had he endeared himself to the people by his genial disposition, his unaffected humility, and unfeigned sincerity of heart.

During the excitement and distractions of the late unhappy civil war all allusions of a political character had been studiously omitted in the services of the church. Men of the most opposite opinions knelt by each others' side forgetful in that house consecrated to the God of love and peace of their differences and troubles. But no good man differed from his brother in reference to the enormous crime which had been committed, and the rector on Easter morning addressed the large congregation assembled to keep the joyful festival of the resurrection in words of the following import, which met a response in every heart and which, referring to one of the marked events in the history of the country, he has been requested to insert in this narrative:

"We are this day surrounded, brethren and friends, by the emblems of death and of national sorrow. What a sad contrast to the joy which should fill our hearts on this morning of the resurrection!

"It hardly becomes me here in this sacred place to speak of that parricidal crime by which the whole country is this day plunged into grief. Indeed, words would fail in the attempt. The effect of it is paralyzing. The heart is appalled at its enormity. It does not seem possible that any human being could reach that height of wickedness as to raise his hand against the life of one who represents at once the majesty of his country and the majesty of God. What enemy hath done this? No man surely who bears the image of his Maker. The earth has borne a monster who is the agent, the emissary, the embodiment, the impersonation of that great adversary of our race who was a murderer from the beginning.

"As we contemplate with grief and horror the enormity of the crime which has been perpetrated by his power and agency, should not at the same time our hearts be lifted up with chastened joy that a Deliverer has come to the rescue of our fallen race, that One has risen who has taken away the penalty of sin, who has broken through the barriers of the grave, who has 'abolished death and brought life and immortality to light'?

"Blessed be His name for the consoling promise that 'He does not willingly grieve the children of men;' that He 'chastens us for our profit;' that when He leads us through the wilderness of discipline and suffering it is to bring us to the land of promise; that when He tries us in the furnace of affliction it is 'to refine us as gold and silver is tried,' that each ransomed soul, cleansed by blood and purified in fire, may be fitted to shine with undimmed lustre in that glorious crown of living gems which shall encircle the Redeemer's brow and illumine the mansions of our Father's house.

"Weep ye not for the dead,' for even the heathen felt that no man could be counted happy before his death, and the Christian 'knows that his Redeemer liveth.' That man's death is surely not to be lamented, whatever cause we may have to mourn his loss, whose sun, having reached its zenith and illumined the earth and filled other stars with its light, descends amid halos of glory; whose memory shall be cherished to the latest generations, and shall terminate only with the duration of his country. To her service his heart and life were devoted, and she has shown her appreciation of his character by all the tenderness of a mother's love mourning the loss of her dearest child; his name will doubtless be enshrined in her annals beside the first and worthiest of her sons.

"While then we share the common grief and deplore this national calamity, there is no ground for despondency or hopeless sorrow. Rather does it become us as Christians to say with the heroic apostle, 'Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory' over sin, death, the grave and hell; who hath opened to us the gates of the kingdom of heaven; and who 'shall reign until He hath put all enemies under his feet.' May He reign triumphantly over the country of our love; may He stanch her bleeding wounds and bind up her broken heart; may He save her from rebellious children and treacherous friends; may He arrest the parricidal hands that seek her life's blood; may He give us pardon and peace!"

An occurrence remains to be mentioned in connection with this parish which had a most important bearing on the establishment of the American Church. "The first step," says Bishop White in his memoirs, "towards the forming of a collective body of the Episcopal Church in the United States was taken (through the medium of the Rev. Abraham Beach) at a meeting of a few clergymen of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania at Brunswick, in New Jersey, on the 13th and 14th of May, 1784. The first day was chiefly taken up with discussing principles of ecclesiastical union. The next morning (in consequence of new information received) it was agreed that nothing should be urged further on the subject at present. But before the clergy parted it was determined to procure a larger meeting on the 5th of the ensuing October in New York, to confer and agree on some general principles of a union of the Episcopal Church throughout the States."

Here did the Lord cause that "noble vine" which He before had planted "to take deep root, and it has filled the land. She has sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. The hills are covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof are like the goodly cedars." God forbid that it should ever wither and droop in the place where it first was planted!

It is a pleasing reflection that the parish has been blessed with the services of the most eminent men that have adorned the American Church. Mr. Wood, the first missionary, having established the church here, became afterwards distinguished for his labors among the Indian tribes of Nova Scotia. Dr. Chandler says of "the worthy, the eminently useful, and amiable Mr. MacKean, probably a better man was never in the Society's service." Chandler himself, "whose praise is in all the Church," with Antill as catechists, sustained the services when the clergy were driven or fled from their posts of duty. Mr. Cutting is described as a "person of piety and virtue, and of much learning and eloquence." To the prudence and fidelity of Mr. Beach the records of the society bear ample testimony; almost twenty years of his useful life were passed in active duty here. Here it was the Apostolic Bishop Seabury commenced his missionary labors; here it was that the zealous, lion-hearted Bishop Hobart ministered in the dawn of his illustrious career; here one who had sat at his feet and imbibed his spirit, the man of his mould and model, that "great-hearted shepherd," was chosen to receive his pastoral crook and sceptre, and began here his pastoral episcopate; and here it was that the faithful Bishop Croes "finished the work which was given him to do."

God grant that His church may be always "ordered and guided by pastors" so "faithful and true." Upon pastors and people, under God's blessing, rests the future condition of the parish. It cannot be foreseen or foretold; but one thing is certain, that so long as peace, based on truth, continues to reign within its borders prosperity will crown its sanctuary. The present rector (with his co-workers), after many years of "patient waiting," has been cheered to see the church enlarged and filled with devout worshipers, and three other churches built within the original boundaries of the parish. They all rest upon one foundation, "the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone," and they are all animated by one spirit of life and love. "Esto perpetua," and to the triune God be the praise!

MISSIONARIES, RECTORS, AND WARDENS OF THE CHURCH FROM 1750 TO 1865.

MINISTERS.

1750. Rev. Mr. Wood,	1791. Rev. Henry Van Dyke.

1760. Rev. Mr. MacKean.	1800. Rev. Mr. Cotton.
1764. Rev. Leonard Cutting.	1801. Rev. John Croes.
1767. Rev. Abraham Beach.	1832. Rev. John Croes, Jr.
1784. Rev. Mr. Rowland.	1839. Rev. Alfred Stubbs.
1787. Rev. George Ogilvie.

WARDENS.

Dr. Charles A. Howard.	Robert Boggs.
Jonathan Deare.	Isaac Lawrence.
John Dennis.	Daniel Kemper.
John Parker.	William Leupp.
Robert Morris.	Dr. Edward Carroll.
Matthew Egerton.	Charles Dunham.
Willet Warne.	Franklin Smith.
George Farmer.	Samuel V. Hoffman.
Stephen Kemble.

Of the ministers of the parish the present incumbent is the only one living, and of the wardens all have been removed from the service of the church militant with the exception of the last three on the list. Three, not the least worthy of the faithful band, have been taken from us since the present rector entered upon his pastoral care. Never can he forget the generous hospitality, the meek and gentle manners of good Dr. Carroll, nor the sterling integrity and unfeigned humility of worthy Mr. Leupp, the fervent devotion of the venerable Col. Kemper. "These all died in faith, and their works do follow them." Sweet is their remembrance upon earth, and may "God remember them for the good deeds they have done for His house and for the offices thereof."

"The time would fail me to tell" of the "holy and humble men of heart," "of whom the world was not worthy," of the godly women adorned with that meek and quiet spirit which God esteems and man overlooks, of the little "children in malice" and guile who were enwielded round with heavenly grace, which shone in their daily life of unostentatious piety, whom it has been my happiness to know in my pastoral course of duty here. "In the sight of the unwise they seem to die, and their departure is taken for misery, and their going from us to be utter destruction, but they are in peace;" side by side they lie, unknown to fame, in that peaceful churchyard; and they will thence arise clothed in the beauty of holiness, with radiant forms of glory, "at the resurrection of the just."

The members of the present corporation are: Rector, the Rev. Alfred Stubbs; Wardens, Samuel V. Hoffman, Franklin Smith; Vestrymen, William H. Leupp, Robert J. Livingston, Edward Flash, William Parsons, J. S. Carpenter, William H. Armstrong, McRee Swift, Treas.; John G. Hall, Sec.; Robert Howell, Beadle.

MEMORIALS.—Of the clergymen mentioned in the preceding narrative who performed ministerial duty in this parish no one has left a dearer memory or a more honored name than the Rev. Dr. Ogilby.

In the year 1832, when only in his twenty-third year, he was, in consequence of his reputation for mature scholarship, elected Professor of Languages in Rutgers College. He was not then in orders, and continued a lay member of the congregation of Christ Church until 1838, when he was admitted to the deaconate and priesthood by the Bishop of New York. Not long after this parish became vacant, and by request of the vestry he readily and freely undertook the temporary charge, in addition to his other labors in the college. While thus engaged he wrote to the present rector, who had just been ordained deacon by the Bishop of New York, and by permission of his diocesan was officiating in the Church of St. Albans, Vermont. We had never met nor seen each other; he was induced by the over-indulgent friendship of Professors Whittingham and Turner, of the General Theological Seminary, to recommend me for the rectorship of the church, which was accordingly offered, and by the advice of ecclesiastical superiors and friends promptly accepted. From this period to the end of his short, useful, and brilliant course I was in the habit of constant and familiar intercourse with him, and I may safely say that a more perfect character than his I have never met, and do not expect to meet again.

He probably enjoyed better health at this time than at any other period of his life. His accurate scholarship and high classical attainments enabled him to discharge the duties of his professorship without laborious study; he had, therefore, many leisure hours to devote to active exercise and to the society of his friends. His mind was then free also from those corroding cares with which it was afterwards weighed down in the more active service of the church. As a natural consequence of such favorable circumstances he was remarkable for cheerfulness and hilarity. His spirits seemed never to flag at home or abroad. Whether in his study, or at the festive board, or in the social circle, his was always the merriest laugh and the happiest partee. It would be strange if such an agreeable and instructive companion did not find a cordial welcome by every hearth and at every table. He could adapt himself with unaffected ease to any age or condition, and it is difficult to say whether young or old greeted him most heartily.

Professor Ogilby made it a point to treat every one he met with the utmost politeness. He would take off his hat with as much deference to a poor laborer as to any gentleman of his acquaintance. This universal courtesy and kindness secured for him universal respect and affection, and hence the very general sorrow that prevailed when the sad news of his decease reached us.

Disinterestedness was one of his most attractive characteristics. He would undergo any labor, undertake any journey, run any risk in order to serve a friend. However feeble his own health might be, he could not resist the appeal of a brother clergyman to aid him in the performance of his duties.

All who knew Dr. Ogilby were astonished at the readiness with which he could master another man's thoughts or give expression to his own. As an instance of this I may mention that in the General Convention of 1847 he immediately answered, without previous preparation, one of the most elaborate speeches ever made in that body, and produced on his side an array of authorities which a bystander would have supposed he had been many months in collecting and arranging. A still more striking instance of the rapid movement of his mind came under my personal observation some years before. His work on lay baptism, which exhibits much careful research, was composed during a few days of his summer vacation, the books he used as authorities being chiefly taken from my own library. His learning, however, was not so extensive as profound; but he thought more and thoroughly digested all that his capacious mind received. Whatever he learned was retained and stored up ready for use at the proper season. His mind resembled a well-furnished armory,—at a moment's warning he could lay his hand upon any implement of war he found it necessary to use; or, like a perfect musical instrument, it was always in tune, "always ready to yield the harmonious concert of sweet sounds."

As a preacher, Dr. Ogilby was remarkable for the thoughtfulness of his discourse and the earnestness of his delivery. He spake "as one having authority," but "with the meekness of wisdom." No one that heard him could fail to be impressed by his manly appearance and the peculiar raciness of his style. Every word was distinctly uttered, and every word was adapted to tell upon the heart and conscience. The eyes of all were fixed steadfastly upon him as soon as he arose, and were seldom withdrawn until his discourse was finished. Yet his sermons were not written to produce popular effect; he studied to be an instructive preacher, and eminently succeeded in conveying instruction in the most engaging form.

To the interests of the church of which he was a member and minister he was most intensely devoted, ready to sacrifice at her altar every private feeling and pleasure that interfered in any degree with these higher obligations. He was for this reason regarded by many as both bigoted and intolerant; but such persons neither understood his principles nor could they appreciate his magnanimous spirit. Decided and uncompromising in his own views, he was yet charitable to those who differed from him, and neither respected nor loved a man less for being, as he himself was, true to his own convictions and decided in maintaining them.

A person who saw Dr. Ogilby only in the discharge of his official duties would hardly believe that so much determination and even sternness as he sometimes manifested on particular occasions could consist with so much gentleness and affection as constantly appeared in his social and domestic intercourse. He was the soul of whatever company he was in, "the cynosure of every eye," and even the coldest and hardest could not help being enlivened and softened by his genial warmth and affable deportment. I must not omit to say that he was remarkable for his attention to little children. As an illustration of this I may mention that during his last illness, after an absence of nearly two years from us, so tender was his recollection of some young friends whom he left behind that he made it his business to purchase for each of them an appropriate toy, suited to the age and sex, on which he carefully inscribed the name of the child for whom it was designed. He little imagined the priceless value his own death was so soon to affix to the last mementos of his unwavering affection.

The attempt to convey a just impression of Dr. Ogilby's character is strangely embarrassed, as his friend Bishop Doane said, "by its singular completeness, consistency, and harmony; it strikes you as a whole rather than in any of its parts, like some exquisite mosaic, where an infinite variety of tints and shades combine to make a perfect picture. He was a man of wonderful reality. No one could ever doubt him; he gave you all his heart; he gave it to whatever he undertook; he went half-way in nothing; he had the highest standard, and held himself up to it. For the learning of the scholar, for the prudence of the counselor, for the helping hand of the executive how many looked to him and leaned on him! How many, alas, have missed him since he has departed!"

How tenderly he was beloved was manifest on the sad occasion of his funeral. The eloquent and impressive discourse preached by Bishop Doane in the morning at Trinity Church, New York, was repeated in the afternoon of the same day in Christ Church, New Brunswick. The students of the General Theological Seminary, who loved him as a brother, followed his remains to their last resting-place. The church was filled with sympathizing friends, and none who were present will ever forget the irrepressible emotion which burst forth from every heart, and the copious tears that were shed over his grave.

On the south side of Christ Church, near the chancel, a window of richest color and finest manufacture, the gift of numerous friends, commemorates the name of Dr. Ogilby. It represents by appropriate emblems his prophetic and priestly office in connection with the trials and the triumph of the Christian "faithful unto death."

Not far off, in the adjoining churchyard, in a secluded spot selected by himself a few years before his death, lie his mortal remains, and over his grave a chaste and solid headstone, erected by his bereaved and loving wife, bears this inscription:

JOHN DAVID OGILBY, D.D.,
Professor of Eccl. History:
Who entered into his rest
Feb. II, MDCCCLL
At the age of forty years, after a life
to Christ and His Church."

In closing this imperfect sketch I can scarcely refrain from saying a word more in addition to what has been already said in the course of the preceding narrative of Dr. Ogilby's great friend, Bishop Doane, who has been the subject of so much animadversion.

For more than twenty years I enjoyed his friendship and intimacy. I had the opportunity of seeing him on all occasions which exhibit a man's character in its fullest light, in public and in private, at home and abroad, in the church and in the house, at the table and by the fireside, in the meetings of the convention, and in those of the standing committee, in trouble and in joy, amid trials and triumphs, and on all occasions he never appeared otherwise than as the Christian bishop and the Christian gentleman. He was a man of colossal dimensions and gigantic power, of great designs and far-seeing vision. He was ahead of the age in which he lived, and was therefore misunderstood and misrepresented. As the representative of great church principles he could not escape the hostility of men of Romish or sectarian proclivities, to which those principles are opposed, some of whom, unhappily, sought to suppress the principles by crushing their unbending advocate; but he had friends as well as foes,—friends who never doubted the sincerity of his purpose and the honesty of his heart, who were ready to make allowance for mistakes which proceeded occasionally from an overzealous devotion to the interests of the church and her institutions.

They who gazed at Bishop Doane through a microscopic glass, or with eyes blinded by party prejudice, could only see spots on the surface of his character which flitted like shadows across the face of the sun; he was to be taken as a whole, complete in all his parts, in the fullness of his stature, to be thoroughly understood and appreciated. They who saw him in this light perceived what a splendid "piece of work" the man was. "How noble in reason! how infinite in faculties! in form and moving, how express and admirable!" Now that he is dead and party enmities buried in his grave, all who knew him, friend and foe, realize and acknowledge the greatness of his worth and the greatness of their loss. He has left to the church the example of a bishop faithful and fearless, who "dared do all that may become a man," and he has left to his diocese besides two noble institutions of Christian learning, which he bought with his life's blood, from which many in generations past and future will arise and bless his name and memory.

On the chalice and paten presented to the church of St. John the Evangelist on the day of the consecration is this inscription:

"In memoriam Warren Livingston."

At the request of Bishop Doane the rector wrote him a brief account of this remarkable young man. The bishop incorporated it in his eighth baccalaureate address to the students of Burlington College, of which the substance is as follows:

Warren Livingston was born in New York in October, 1834. My acquaintance with him began when he was a boy of nine or ten years old. As there was no school in connection with my parish, I offered to give him and some other young parishioners instruction in my study. During a year or more he was there my sole companion. He was such a lover of books and so earnest to learn that he needed no fellow-students to excite his emulation, no rivals to arouse his ambition. There was scarcely ever occasion to find fault with him; and so sensitive was he to reproof, that a word or sign of disapprobation would fill his eyes with tears.

He was a child of wonderful memory, of quick perception, of vivid imagination, thoughtful beyond his years, with the faculty of expressing his ideas in language not less elegant than accurate. It was a perfect treat to hear him translate the finest passages of Virgil and Cicero. He could discern and appreciate their most delicate shades of meaning, and express them in words which fell like music on the ear.

Warren entered Burlington College in 1849. His teachers and his classmates will testify to the perfect accuracy of these expressions. He was a scholar heart and soul.

After he went to Burlington I only saw him during his vacations, but I have been informed by one of his fellow-students that he was there considered facile princeps in all the studies of the college, and that in a class of young men of uncommon abilities.

His love of knowledge was but kindled there. So far from supposing his education completed when he had finished the course of study, he longed for wider opportunities of learning and higher ranges of science and letters. Instead of giving himself up to a mere life of literary ease or being content to drift with the mad currents of the world, he had no sooner received the degree of Bachelor in Arts than he proposed to repair to the ancient University of Oxford, and was entered at Worcester College. Here he remained four years. His principal studies were his favorite classics, ancient and modern history, and the Holy Scriptures, with especial reference to chronology. How well he used his opportunities the distinctions which he won best prove. He took a second-class honor in history and a fourth-class honor in the classics. The last was beyond all expectation, as it requires a thorough training in what in this country has been little regarded, Greek and Latin versification. Notwithstanding the competition which he had to meet with from scholars trained at Eton and at Harrow, he attained a high position at Oxford. Alas! he there too became the subject of the insidious disease which undermined his life. He scarcely lived a year after his return, and on the very day which completed his three-and-twentieth year ceased to be mortal.

Our young friend's character was composed of so many delicate traits, all blending like rays of light to form a perfect arch of beauty, that it is not easy to separate the various tints, or to say which shone with the brightest lustre. I was, however, peculiarly attracted by his gentleness of disposition. He was, in the highest and best sense of the word, a perfect gentleman,—gentle in his demeanor, gentle in his tastes, gentle in his feelings. There was in the temper of his mind “a radiant sweetness” which spread into his words and actions. This suavity of manner was not with him an external grace. It had its seat in the affections. It sprang from kindness of heart. It was doubtless the product of that blessed Spirit whose first fruits are love and peace. “For” (to use a beautiful illustration of Archbishop Leighton) “as the roots of plants lie hid under ground and manifest their excellence in branches and flowers and fruits, so the graces of the Spirit, planted in the soul, though themselves unseen, yet discover their being and life in the words, actions, and demeanor of a Christian. Now, if the root be love, the fruits of gentleness and courtesy will spring from it and discover it.” It was in this sense of the word that I styled our young friend a gentleman. He was a thorough Christian gentleman,—affable in his speech, courteous in his address, refined in his feelings, and gentle in his manner.

In connection with this characteristic may be mentioned another feature of Christian loveliness, his unaffected humility and meekness of spirit. A young man, educated in the most celebrated university in the world, and enjoying there the highest advantages, entitled by his fortune and family connections to move in the best society, might naturally have spoken with complacency, not unmingled with youthful pride, of the magnificent scenes through which it was his favored lot to pass, and of the distinguished company which it was his singular privilege to enjoy. But Warren seldom spoke of them. He seemed utterly devoid of vanity and self-conceit. He prided not himself on his wealth, his learning, or his personal advantages. He exhibited no conscious superiority over his fellows. No one felt humbled in his presence, for no one felt that he exacted undue admiration or respect. All, therefore, who knew him loved him. All were ready to acknowledge his worth, and to pay the regard which was richly due.

But if in his intercourse with men our friend's humility was so apparent, much more was it in the service of his God. He never obtrusively displayed his religious feelings, for true religion is “too genuine to be ostentatious.” His disposition was retiring and self-communing, for he had learned of Him “who was meek and lowly of heart,” and whose “voice was not heard in the streets.” Like Him, he went apart to meditate and pray, and poured forth the sorrows and joys of his heart on the bosom of his God. That a spirit of this modest, childlike nature was favored with special manifestations of the Divine presence who can doubt? For as the highest heavens are the habitation of God's glory, so “the humble heart hath the next claim to be the habitation of His grace.”

The unselfishness of our dear friend's disposition was another characteristic to which I will briefly advert. Sickness, especially if long protracted, has often the unhappy tendency to make us selfish, querulous, and exacting. Invalids will frequently exaggerate their sufferings to excite the sympathy of friends. But in this instance the effect was evidently made to conceal weakness and pain. He strove to dissipate the anxiety and sorrow which he perceived were weighing heavily on the hearts of relatives and friends. Instead of exacting sacrifices of their time and attention, this generous and disinterested son and brother was continually making sacrifices of his own ease and pleasure to procure for those whom he loved comfort and enjoyment.

My feelings scarcely allow me to dwell more at length on the pure and lovely character of our deceased brother. The more I reflect on his worth the greater appears our loss; and the thought that we shall see his face no more is almost insupportable to the faithful and loving friends, who seemed to live in the light of his countenance. But we may not lament that he has left his parental home to enter the glorious mansions of his Father's house. Nor may we desire that he should "Wander back to life, and lean

On our frail love once more,"

who is, we believe, among that happy company of the redeemed which "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, in whose mouth was found no guile, who are without fault before the throne of God," and in his presence partake of fullness of joy.

Let me hasten to the scene which closed the earthly career of this excellent young man. On the Sunday previous to his death he was in his customary place at church, and partook in his usual devout manner of the blessed sacrament. On Friday morning of the same week I was summoned at an early hour to his last bed of sickness. On entering the room he welcomed me with a smile, but with his finger on his lips, to inform me that he was not allowed to answer. He spoke first when I offered to pray with him, and requested that the door might be shut, in order that we might be alone with Him who heareth and seeth in secret. He was fully aware that his life was fast ebbing away, but no murmur escaped his lips, no sign betrayed the least symptom of fear or despondency: his countenance was calm. Now and then smiles of resignation and peace seemed to play upon his pallid features, and they beamed radiant with hope. When his bodily weakness deprived him of the power of speech and he reclined in apparent insensibility, I said to him, "Warren, your Saviour does not leave you in this dark hour?" He answered in the negative by a gentle movement of his head. I said to him again, "You know in whom you have put your trust?" and he in like manner gave the signal of assent. A few moments after I commended his soul into the hands of a faithful Creator and most merciful Saviour. A brief struggle with the last enemy ensued; the victory was won. His immortal spirit was delivered from the burden of the flesh, and was carried by the angels into the bosom of his Saviour and his God.

"Oh, sir, the good die first;
And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
Burn to the socket."

This has been sadly exemplified in another instance of more recent date.

Rensen Schuchardt partook of Warren Livingston's gentle disposition and guileless spirit, with his mind "tempered to finest issues" by heaven's finest touch. His health was likewise undermined by the same insidious disease just as he had completed his education in the schools of Germany. He came back to the happy home of his childhood, whose voices filled his heart's pure depths with unalloyed delight and yearning love only to be transferred to that happier household of sisters and brothers in the mansions of heaven. He fell asleep as sweetly as the tired child rests in confiding love on its mother's breast,

"And in his father's arms Contented dies away."

Did time and space allow, many more might be added to these memorials of the departed, but the record has already extended beyond the original design.

Warren Livingston and Rensen Schuchardt were only two among the many who as children were catechised in the church, and who have since grown in grace as in stature. Some have been called with them to a higher seat in "the church of the first-born written in heaven," and others remain as "polished pillars" to uphold and adorn the church on earth.

Of the hundreds admitted into her fold by holy baptism, and who have sealed their vows in confirmation and in the sacrament of the altar, many have become teachers and catechists, and in schools and classes on Sunday and week-day have aided the rector in instilling those principles of the Creed and the Catechism which must form the basis of thorough church instruction. Without compromise of these principles the congregation has grown and flourished, and peace and love maintained with all Christian people. The observation of Seabury and Beach and Cutting a century ago, that all denominations were living here together in a friendly manner, without strife or animosities, holds true at the present day, and the rector is happy to acknowledge among them some of his most esteemed and excellent friends; meanwhile no sacrifice has been made or asked of those distinctive doctrines and services by which the church is denoted.

It is on record that in the times of the Revolution this was the only church in the province in which divine service was regularly performed, and she has always enjoyed this singular blessing; her doors have never been closed, in summer or winter, on the Lord's day, and but seldom on the days in each week which commemorate His betrayal and crucifixion, or the memory of His saints. By this means her children have been trained to worship among that blessed company who "serve God day and night in His temple."

Of this childlike, "Christ-like throng," who adorn their Father's household in heaven and celebrate His praise, is one whose memorial, written by her bishop and friend, now in Paradise, will close this record of the living and the dead:

"The bishop of New Jersey, as will appear by the diocesan record, was drawn aside from his double duty to his parish and to the visitation by one of those sacred claims which lay hold of the 'most dear heart-strings.' Death had entered the dwelling of one of his most excellent and beloved presbyters, and taken from it the partner of his hearth and heart, and he hastened to consign his darling to her sacred resting-place 'beneath the church's shade.'

"Mrs. Stubbs was the daughter of Abel Houghton, Esq., of St. Albans, Vt. She was educated partly in Burlington, Vt., and partly in Hartford, Conn., and she did honor to her teachers. A woman of a more judicious and available education is seldom seen. She was remarkable at the schools for her proficiency in mathematics and in music. The former was among the foundations of her intellectual character. The latter she continued to the last to make profitable to her children and delightful to her friends.

"She was married in 1840 to the Rev. Alfred Stubbs, rector of Christ Church, New Brunswick, and died on the morning of Good Friday, April 10th, in the thirty-ninth year of her age. She was the mother of seven children, two of whom went before her into rest. The birthday of the first of these two children was also the birthday of her immortal life.

"An annual inmate of her house for seventeen years, the present writer can well bear testimony to her excellence. She had been early taught to be wise, to love her husband, to love her children. She was emphatically a keeper at home. She was 'well reported of for good works;' she had 'brought up children;' she had 'lodged strangers;' she had 'washed the saints' feet;' she had 'relieved the afflicted;' she had 'diligently followed every good work.' She was the very kind of woman who supplied the portrait to 'King Lemuel,' in the last chapter of the book of Proverbs. Her diligence, her economy, her skill, her taste, her tact, her gentle lovingness made the parsonage one of the most pleasant of all houses to be at home in. To her husband she was indeed 'a helpmeet for him.' And no children were ever blessed with a better mother. She was mistress of that crowning art, the government of the tongue. With the utmost gentleness she combined the utmost firmness. She was unwearied in the discharge of every domestic duty and relation. And yet her heart took in the world for sympathy and charity,—

"She was a woman of a steady mind;
Tender and deep in her excess of love:
Not speaking much; pleased rather with the joy
Of her own thoughts. By some especial care
Her temper had been framed as if to make
A being who, by adding love to pence, Might live on earth a life of happiness."

"But she had outgrown this present life, and He in whom she lived has taken her to be with Him. Her death was scarcely counted on until it came. But it did not take her unawares. To the Christian physician who referred her to the highest source of strength, she replied that she had not then to seek such grace. She had lived on it. But half an hour before her death she started from her tranquil state, and asked for 'more light,' and for 'paper.' She was thinking, doubtless, of her absent parents. When her husband, with a strength not human, offered by her bedside the commendatory prayer, she meekly crossed her hands upon her bosom, and in a few moments was at rest. 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; for they rest from their labors.'

"The concourse of people which filled the church and the adjoining ground at her funeral was a becoming tribute of sympathizing respect to her bereaved husband. The sobs and tears, which could not be repressed, were her best eulogy. God comfort his own stricken ones!"

In the north angle of the ivy-clad tower, in a sweet nook of ground, by the side of the beds of roses which she planted for her little ones who had fallen asleep before to rest in, lie the sacred relics of the purest shrine that was ever tenanted by an immortal spirit; and the headstone bears this inscription, written by one who knew no words that could fully express the greatness of her worth:

"Here sleeps in the blessed hope of a joyful resurrection, EMILIA HOUGHTON STUBBS, of a meek and quiet spirit full of faith and good works, who entered into rest
on Good Friday, MDCCCLVII, Aged thirty-eight years.

"Lord, remember me when Thou comest!"

First Baptist Church, New Brunswick.—As the First Baptist Church in New Brunswick is the daughter of next to the oldest Baptist Church in the State, it is claimed that of these early settlers six men at least were Baptists. The celebrated Hausard Knollys preached Baptist sentiments in old Piscataqua as early as 1638, and as New Brunswick had after the long pastorate of Rev. John Drake of fifty years been occasionally supplied by him coming from Piscataqua to this city, and also of Rev. Mr. Stelle occasional visits here, this city had in that time increased considerably, and Rev. Reune Runyon in 1783 became pastor of the First Baptist Church after preaching here, also many of the members of the above church having fixed residences here ("in our town").

When Deacon Asa Runyon built the fine substantial brick house corner of Neilson and Church Streets, three-quarters of a century ago, he did not forget to consecrate it to the Lord. In the room adjoining that now occupied by the insurance company many meetings were held for prayer and praise. Preaching services were held occasionally.

"The Hon. James Parker, of Perth Amboy, N. J., having kindly offered to deed a lot of ground lying on the northeast corner of George and Somerset Streets (the present site of the depot of the railroad company, then used as a family burying-place) to any religious body who would erect thereon a respectable house for public worship, some twenty or more individuals, Baptist in sentiment, most of whom were members in good standing of the church in Piscataway living in New Brunswick, resolved to avail themselves of his offer and erect for the denomination a meeting-house." In the summer of 1809 Asa Runyon, together with John Bray, Esq., called on Mr. Parker, and signified to him their acceptance of his proposition, and contracted with him for the purchase of additional land, by which they secured a lot more than two hundred feet square. In the month of September a meeting was called at the house of Asa Runyon. There were present at that meeting Asa Runyon, John Bray, Abraham Potts, Squire Martin, George Clark, James Dunham, and James Concklin. They soon secured about three thousand dollars, which was considered ample to warrant them in building, and in the spring of 1810 the foundation was commenced, and by degrees the work was carried on. It was not until the fall of 1812 that it was completed, at a cost of five thousand dollars. This church with the Piscataway congregation jointly called as their pastor the Rev. James McLaughlin, with the understanding that the services of the Lord's Day were to be held in Piscataway in the morning, and in New Brunswick in the afternoon. This arrangement continued until September, 1817. On Sept. 21, 1816, the members residing in New Brunswick were, by the adoption of a series of articles of faith, and by entering into solemn covenant one with another, constituted a regular gospel church. The following are the names of the first members:

Asa Runyon.	Sarah Runyon.
Henry Wright.	Sarah Probasco.
Richard Lupardus.	Walter M. Henry.
Sarah Merrill.	Ruth Brenner.
Joseph Runyon.	Abin Potts.
Hephzibah Walker.	Suannah Martin.
Phebe Runyon.	Richard E. Runyon.
Abigail Coon.	Sarah Ayres.
Elizabeth Runyon.	Sarah L. Dunham.
Squire Martin.	Charles E. Hollingshead.
Charlotte Lupardus.	Sarah Kent.
Sarah Post.	Ethier Potts.

Comprising twenty-four members, who have long ago passed away.

Rev. James McLaughlin was a man of deep piety, a good minister of Jesus Christ, and one whom the members looked as to a father. He resided in this then town during his pastorate of the two churches; he gave much time and energy to build up the little band. In 1817 he removed to the pastorate of the Second Church in Philadelphia. He died at Lambertville, Aug. 19, 1827, and his dust lies buried in the cemetery at Harborton. After some months the church was supplied. The following list of pastors of this old historic church:

James McLaughlin, September, 1816–September, 1817.

John Johnson, July, 1818–August, 1819.
Greenleaf S. Webb, April, 1821–October, 1843.
George R. Bliss, October, 1843–April, 1849.
Shobal S. Parker, April, 1850–April, 1852.
George Kempton, July, 1852–May, 1857.

Thomas R. Howlett, September, 1858–September, 1859.

Mortimer S. Riddell, September, 1860–April, 1868.
Henry F. Smith, April, 1869; vacant, 1882.

The extent of the visitation of God's mercy eternally only will disclose. This church has had many extensive revivals. The following account is here given:

From September, 1816, to June,	1820, 14;	membership, 40.
" June, 1820, "	" 1830, 43;	" 80.
" " 1830, "	" 1840, 214;	" 253.
" " 1840, "	" 1850, 65;	" 207.
" " 1850, "	" 1860, 129;	" 296.
" " 1860, " October, 1870, 215;	" 471.
" October, 1870, "	" 1880, 333;	" 540.

There are those who remember the first church, many of whose bricks are now in the depot which occupies its site. They recall its ascent by steps, its plain front, double rows of windows, high pulpit, oil lamps, candles, and old-fashioned furniture. They have seen Mr. Webster, the old-time sexton, fill the foot-stoves with glowing coals to keep the ladies' feet warm. But the "march of improvement" sweeps away time-honored structures. The construction of the railroad necessitated removal. The living must seek a new locality where they may listen to the gentle sound of the gospel undisturbed by the locomotive's shriek, and the dust that rests in the old graveyard must be taken to a new sepulchre. A favorable sale to the railroad company was made, and with additional subscriptions the edifice now occupied was built. The trustees of that period, among whom were Judge Runyon, Messrs. Dean and Randolph, who have departed, and Ambrose Randolph, Esq., still among them. The new church is situated on corner of George and Bayard Streets. A lecture-room on Renssen Avenue was built and dedicated March 16, 1872. The lot was given by Deacon A. Van Wickle.

The following is the list of deacons from the first:

" Randolph Martin, removed from the place; but on his return he was re-elected.

" Richard Van Arsdale and Peter D. Cline were elected deacons in 1836, but never served.

" Asa Runyon, chosen Nov. 15, 1816; died May 11, 1818.

" Richard Lupardus, chosen Nov. 15, 1816; died Nov. 6, 1835.

" Robert Lyle, chosen Jan. 3, 1826; died Jan. 28, 1876.

" Jephtha Dunham, chosen Dec. 8, 1835; died February, 1859.

" Randolph Martin, chosen May 5, 1839; died December, 1876.

" Peter R. Stelle, chosen April 9, 1839; died February, 1871.

" S. Van Wickle, chosen Jan. 29, 1857.

" William Kent, chosen May 27, 1859.

" I. S. Van Anglen, chosen Jan. 25, 1871.

" John T. Morgan, chosen Jan. 25, 1871.

" Eliza Baker, chosen March 22, 1871; died August, 1874.

" William Dunham, Jr., chosen Nov. 24, 1874.

" H. B. Zimmerman, chosen Feb. 21, 1877.

" Henry Whitney, chosen Feb. 21, 1877."

The church clerks have been Charles E. Hollingshead, Henry Wright, Stephen F. Randolph (from 1838 to 1846), David F. Randolph (from 1846 to 1849), Nelson Dunham (from 1849 to the present time, forty-one years).

Shiloh Methodist Episcopal Church.—Methodism was established in America in 1766. A company from Ireland settled in New York, among whom were Philip Embury and Barbara Heck, whose names have been household words in Methodist circles. Shiloh Methodist Episcopal Church was granted a charter June 13, 1799; Rev. J. Totten, minister. After ten days' notice, a public meeting for the election of a board of trustees was held May 27, 1811. Before Mr. Runyon, justice of the peace, appeared on July 18, 1811, Jacob Snyder, James Williams, David Oliver, Michael Pool, Joel Conger, Henry Gross, and John Vliet, and took oath severally to faithfully administer the office of trustees of the Shiloh Methodist Episcopal Church of New Brunswick. This, the first church, was erected in 1811, on the site of the chapel now in Liberty Street, which was purchased by Rev. James Smith, of Philadelphia, from the trustees of Queen's College, for $528. The deed was recorded Feb. 25, 1817, and conveyed by Smith to the congregation, April 26, 1817, for one dollar. It therefore appears that Rev. J. Totten secured a charter in 1799, but little was done till 1811, when the church was erected. There is no record of a pastor till 1820, and the church was probably an appointment on one of the large circuits, and had preaching by the pastor in charge once in two weeks, and by the junior preacher the same.

In 1820, Rev. Charles Pitman was stationed in New Brunswick, and found twenty members, and remained two years, and left a membership of sixty. This church was blown down by the tornado on June 19, 1835, and through the efforts of Mr. Robert Miller and Jacob Edmonds funds were secured, less one thousand dollars loaned on mortgage (which was afterwards given to the church), and a new building erected, and until May, 1876, they worshiped in this their second building, but owing to the large increase of members it was decided to build their noble edifice, which in 1876 was dedicated, situated on the corner of Liberty and George Streets, at a cost of nearly sixty thousand dollars. As near as can be learned the following have been the pastors: Rev. Mr. Colcloser came in 1839, and remained till the spring of 1840, when he was transferred to Philadelphia Conference; Rev. Charles H. Whitecar, 1840-41; Rev. M. E. Ellison, 1841-42; Rev. J. S. Porter, 1842-43; Rev. Wesley Hudson, 1843-44; he died while pastor here; Rev. James Ayres, 1845, 1849-50; Rev. Samuel T. Monroe, 1851-52; Rev. L. R.

Dunn remained about six weeks, when Rev. John D. Blane came, 1852-53; Nicholas Van Zant, 1854-55; Rev. Richard Chalker, 1856-57, and returned in 1874-75; Rev. R. V. Laurence, 1866-68; Rev. Richard Strattan, 1870; Rev. B. F. Sharp, 1871-72; Rev. William E. Boyle, 1873; Rev. R. J. Phelps, 1876-78; Rev. J. C. Heisler, 1879-80; Rev. Edmund Heuitt, 1881; Rev. William P. Davis, the present pastor, 1882.

The present board of trustees are Adam Green, president; John Dixon, secretary; Theodore Ashmore, treasurer; David Buzze, — Kidder, and Isaac Vanarsdale. It is contemplated to commence the building of a chapel in the rear of the church for their Sabbath-school and other meetings, at a cost of ten thousand dollars. Membership, four hundred and fifty-one; church accommodations, one thousand.

Pitman Methodist Episcopal Church.—This church was erected in 1853. It had forty-seven members from Liberty Street. It is situated on the corner of George and Oliver Streets. A neat frame building, with brick basement. Their church property, including their parsonage, fifteen thousand dollars. The society are free from incumbrances. Rev. Charles E. Coit was their first pastor, and remained two years, 1853-54.

In 1851 there was but one Methodist Episcopal Church in New Brunswick. In view of the prosperous condition of Methodism, and also of the prospective growth of the town in the section where the present church edifice stands, it was deemed well to establish another organization, and build another church in the new district. Measures were immediately inaugurated to bring about this result. Subscriptions were soon secured, and a lot on Carman Street purchased. This was found not to be the best location, and through the agency of James Bishop the present site, corner of George and Oliver Streets, was secured in exchange for the Carman Street lot. The project having been so far successful, it soon became a serious question, Who shall constitute the new organization? To answer this a meeting of the officers was called, and it was determined by that body (then consisting of twelve persons) that six of their own number, with their families, should be chosen by the pastor to constitute the new organization, while the remaining six should stay with the old church. The six persons chosen to go over to the new church were Davis Carel, Robert Miller, John Helm, William Owens, George W. Price, and Staten Jeffries. In those days it was common for the same man to hold at one time the three offices of trustee, steward, and class-leader. Four of these persons already mentioned being class-leaders, they were followed by most or all of their several classes, so that the actual membership of the new church when first started was nearly fifty persons.

The building, which is frame with a brick basement, was dedicated to divine worship by Bishop Janes on Sunday, Aug. 11, 1852.

The following is the list of pastors and their time of service: Revs. Charles S. Coit, 1852-53; Charles E. Hill, 1854-55; Elwood H. Stokes, 1856-57; Joseph B. Dobbins, 1858-59; Philip Cline, 1860-61; Elwood H. Stokes, 1862; Henry M. Brown, 1863-64; George Hughes, 1865; Richard Thorne, 1866-68; Charles R. Hartranft, 1869-71; Charles W. Heisley, 1872-74; David H. Schock, 1875-77; C. K. Flemming, 1878; E. C. Hancock, 1879-81; Henry Belting, present pastor, appointed March, 1882.

The name of Pitman was given the church in honor of Rev. Charles Pitman, who had once been the pastor of the old church, and who was now in the height of his remarkable career of usefulness.

The building has accommodations for six hundred persons. The membership at present (April, 1882) is two hundred and eighty-one.

The following persons constitute the officers: Pastor, Henry Belting; Supernumerary, James Caughy; Local Elder, J. R. Van Kirk; Trustees, A. Gulick (president), S. Murgatroyd (secretary), David Carel (treasurer), J. S. Doyle, J. Cheeseman, R. S. Wark, H. W. Needham; Stewards, J. R. Van Kirk (recording steward), A. J. Wark, George Rule, M. H. Vickery, J. Voorhees, L. Cronk, R. Timmons, George Buckelew, S. S. Priestley; Sunday-school Superintendent, W. S. Van Doran; Sexton, William Tindell.

St. Peter's (Catholic) Church.—The following interesting sketch of the rise and progress of Catholicism in New Brunswick is taken from the Sacred Heart Union. It is indorsed by the authorities of St. Peter's Church as being a correct history of the period which it covers, and it is certainly as interesting as anything we could write were we to attempt to cover the same ground with a newly-prepared article. It is therefore inserted here as a part of the history of St. Peter's, as well as of the Catholic Church in general in New Brunswick and some of the neighboring cities:

"This is an age and country of rapid and extensive progress. And yet how few of us consider where we stood a century ago, or even fifty years back. True as this is in matters political, it is none the less so in religious affairs. How few of us who worship in large, commodious, comfortable, and highly-ornamented temples, who have priests at every call, and Catholic schools in every locality, who have Catholic newspapers and Catholic magazines, how few of us have any idea of the hardship and suffering, the frequent humiliations, the bitter trials undergone by the grandfathers and grandmothers of the youth of to-day in the practice and transmission of that faith which is to-day our choicest blessing, our glory, and our pride. Scattered and bare as are the facts preserved to us, yet they are defined enough in their character to make their tracings matter of some interest.

"In the hope, therefore, that this paper may not be uninteresting, we have collected such facts as we could concerning early Catholicity in New Brunswick, N. J., and concerning him to whose untiring and self-sacrificing efforts, firm yet kind government and shrewd management, as well as holy example, we owe, under God, whatever of success we now possess in matters religious. It goes without saying that we refer to the good, saintly, and venerable Father Rogers, who has braved the heats and the colds of half a century of missionary life, and is to-day clear in mind and sound in body, ready at his post to exercise the duties of the priesthood.

"We have been unable to obtain one iota from the reverend gentleman himself concerning his life and labors, his modest retiring disposition making him as reticent as a marble statue when any information of that nature is sought. But to an intelligent and trustworthy member of the congregation our application was more successful, and to her we are mainly indebted for the following facts.

"The first Catholics concerning whose coming to New Brunswick there is any remembrance was a colony from the province of Ulster, Ireland. They did not number fifty in all, and came in two divisions, the first about 1814, the second in 1816. Included among these were the McDede, McConlough, McGrady, McShane, Campbell, Hagerty, Gilco, Kelly, DeVinne, Murphy, Butler, and Hason families. Their children, from the Isle of Saints, form the original stock of our present Catholic population. For years they met in one another's houses to recite the rosary and keep burning the light of faith. It was, owing to the scarcity of priests at the time, and the difficulty of transit to and from New York, very hard to obtain one even to say mass. There are the descendants of one of these families who proudly tell that from the day their grandfather set foot in New Brunswick there has not passed one evening in which the family has not been assembled and the beads recited. It was to such piety as this that the original stock owed it that they kept the faith, kept it though they were laughed and jeered at, kept it though they had no priest, and if they wanted to see one or to hear mass, or to receive the sacraments they had to go to New York, a three days' trip, undertaken only at great expense and difficulty, but which they counted for almost nothing compared with the benefit and comfort received.

"The first priest concerning whom there is any recollection who visited New Brunswick was a Father McDonough. He was on his way from New York to Philadelphia. As he was coming up George Street Mr. Butler and another Catholic were coming down. The pair espied the stranger and surmised from his appearance that he was a priest. He noticed that they were comparing notes concerning him, and stepped over to interview them. 'You're Irishmen?' was his opening. 'We are,' was the response. 'And Catholics?' he continued. 'And you're a priest?' came the quick half question, half affirmation. 'I am,' was the answer, which settled their surmises, and which opened for him a welcome such as Irishmen alone could give to the first priest they had seen in their midst since they had landed. The priest stayed at Butler's that night, and preached to the Catholics who gathered there that evening, and next day started for Philadelphia.

"Next came the Rev. Dr. Powers, from St. Peter's, New York, about 1825. He said the first mass ever celebrated in the town, in a house occupied by Terence Rice, in the upper end of Allsay Street. The first baptism administered in New Brunswick was to Sarah Butler in 1825. Later on, when Rice moved to the old 'Bartle Mansion,' on Church Street, where Zimmerman's store now is, mass was said there once a month.

"In 1829, Father Schneller came in Dr. Powers' place every month. He suggested and urged the building of a church. The people were delighted with the idea. But the most difficult part of the plan was to obtain a plot. No one would sell ground for a Catholic Church. In this difficulty Father Schneller borrowed six hundred dollars from Dr. Springer, of New York, a Protestant, intrusted it to Robert Butler with instructions to try and buy from Dominic Jacob Edmunds the plot opposite the present public school on Bayard Street. Butler saw the dominie, said he wanted the property for himself and his children, which was true as far as it went. The sale was successfully consummated in the name of Butler. But when the transfer was made to the priest there ensued great excitement and objection on the part of our separated brethren; nevertheless the church went up all the same, and it was called St. Peter and Paul's.

"It was a very plain structure of brick, with but two windows, and without a bit of paint on any of the woodwork. This was in 1830. The entire population of the town was six thousand, and the Catholic portion some three hundred souls. Father Schneller came once a month and said mass till 1833. At times his place was filled by Father (afterwards Bishop) O'Reilly, who went down with the steamer 'President' some years ago.

"In 1833, Father McArdle came and took up his residence in New Brunswick, where he remained until 1839, when he was transferred to Paterson. It was in his time that the terrible tornado which visited New Brunswick with such sad results in 1835 tore away the rear end of the church. The open space was closed up with boards, and so remained till 1847.

"For some time the people were again without a resident priest, but Father Medina, and after him Father Deniber, came every two weeks and said mass and ministered to the faithful. Next came Father McGuire, who took up his residence with Mr. Boylan, and remained until 1845, saying mass every Sunday in the little brick church.

"And now in 1845 came Father Rogers. A glance at his previous history will be interesting.

"He was born in Fermanagh County, Ireland, seventy-seven years ago, and was well advanced in the classics when he met Bishop Dubois at his cousin's in Dublin. The bishop gained the good will of the young student, who soon after left home and came to New York at his lordship's invitation. Before leaving home he went to the curate, between whom and himself there was a warm friendship, to seek his blessing. 'God bless you,' said the priest, 'and may be I'll soon be after you to the big land.' 'Little did I then think,' said Father Rogers, some time since, 'that I would ever see him again, much less that I would one day succeed him here as pastor of St. Peter's.' The curate alluded to was the Rev. Father McArdle, the first resident pastor.

"Having finished his studies at Chambly and Montreal, he was ordained priest in 1834 by the Right Rev. Bishop Lartigue. For some months, on request of Bishop Lartigue, he remained in Canada to administer the sacraments to some of the English-speaking residents, but his own superior, Bishop Dubois, recalled and appointed him to the parish of Onondaga, N. Y. As a pioneer in this section of the country much hard work was his share, but he proved equal to the burden, and soon a new church was started, and by his untiring energy and the earnest co-operation of the people successfully completed. Indeed, so great was his zeal that it nearly cost him his life, for, giving all the time possible to the supervision of the new structure, he was one day on the ground when a hod-carrier was taken sick. The masons were calling for mortar, and a strong effort was being made to have a certain portion of the wall finished at a fixed time. The sun sent his fierce rays down upon the workers, yet the priest seized the hod, and actually carried brick and mortar till he was sunstruck himself. And it was while he was in bed under this stroke that a sick call came. He was wanted to attend a man fourteen miles off. The doctor told the priest he would never reach the place alive. Nothing daunted, the young priest ordered a bed to be put in a wagon, saying to those around him, 'I took the cross, and I'm not going to throw it down now that a man needs my help to get to heaven. If I only reach him—and please God I will—and administer the sacraments, I'm not afraid to die in harness.' And so he on his bed was taken to the man in his bed. The priest prepared the sick man and was carried home. The doctor's prophecy never got a more living denial.

"During the ten years he remained in Onondaga he was often known to attend sick calls at a distance of fifty miles, and on one occasion went over one hundred miles in a sleigh to administer the last sacraments. Yet amidst all this he found time for teaching the children, as instanced in the case of the present Bishop Boltes, who received his first Latin lessons from him in Onondaga.

"In 1844 he was sent to Jersey City, where he resided with the late Father Kelly, and went every Sunday for some time to say mass in Hoboken, in an old barn opposite the site of the present magnificent structure of St. Mary's.

"In 1845, Bishop Hughes sent him to New Brunswick, telling him that he would have to sulk the rod of firmness in the oil of kindness, and with it whip out the serpent of the hateful old trustee system, which there as elsewhere had caused much trouble. And the priest was faithful to the charge; for though the serpent raised its head the first Sunday he came, and occasionally afterwards, he then and always beat it down stoutly, but without any noise or commotion.

"The year before he came the church had been sold under foreclosure, and bought in for the congregation for $600. Meantime mass was said in Mr. Poylan's on Church Street. Father Rogers' first step was to lift this debt, and this he soon did by extraordinary work, and the church was again opened.

"In 1847 he tore away the boards that inclosed the back of the church and enlarged the edifice. Next he built a school and had about thirty children in attendance. Meanwhile he lived in a little house beside the church, and some of the old folks laughingly tell that when they called on the priest he would invite them in and bid them take a chair, seating himself on a trunk beside a little wooden table. Then allowing the visitor to remain in perplexity for some moments, he would suddenly, as if reminded of the fact, apologize for the absence of chairs by saying in a very confidential tone that he had loaned them out the night before to a wedding party.

"Beside attending to New Brunswick, he also visited Perth Amboy, South Amboy, Woodbridge, Somerville, Millstone, Plainfield, and Princeton. He would have mass at 8 o'clock in New Brunswick on one Sunday, and then go in a carriage to one of the above-mentioned places and say another mass. On the succeeding week he would go on Saturday afternoon to one of these places, hear confessions, and say early mass on Sunday. Hard work this, yet he never complained of anything save the mosquitoes that would meet him on the way to Amboy, and escort him there and back with musical and insinuating assiduity, never leaving him, not even while he was on the altar. He has built churches in South Amboy, Plainfield, and Princeton, and added something to the one already in Perth Amboy. For years these places were the subjects of his unremitting care.

"In 1854 he had the Bayard Street church enlarged again, and put in a gallery and an organ. A Miss Fauny Ward was the first organist, and the present Miss Ann Nugent, whose hair is now snowy white, and whose voice is not as good as it used to be, was one of the first singers. There are those living who yet speak in high terms of Ann's touching rendition of the hymn, 'Mother Sweet.'

"The building of the railroad bridge in 1835, the erection of the old saw-mill by Mr. Neilson, the starting of the rubber-factory by Mr. Horace Day shortly after, and the other improvements undertaken brought an increase of population, principally Irish Catholics, so that with those already here and those arriving it became necessary to build a larger church to accommodate them. In 1858 the site where the present St. Peter's Church now stands was purchased and the work started. The building and completion of the church, which is now one of the largest and most ornate as well as desirably located in the State, stands a worthy monument to honor the memory of this veteran priest, and a credit to the parish over which he has so long and faithfully presided. The coming of Father McCosker, now in Rahway, the work of Father Dugan and Father Dowdes, the large and commodious school on George Street, with eight hundred children, under the guidance of seven devoted Sisters of Charity and two lay teachers, from whose lips the little ones learn the secret of true wisdom, the establishment of societies for young and old to unite and emulate efforts in the practice of virtue, the untiring and eminently successful efforts of the gifted Father O'Grady are matters of present history.

"Father Rogers still lives, as hale and full of vigor as most men at half his age, and to mark his ruddy cheek and elastic step as he comes down every morning to say mass one would never suppose they belonged to one who probably labored with greater and more continuous zeal than any other leader of the good cause in New Jersey, and that against obstacles almost inconceivable. And yet a more retiring, unostentatious person it would be difficult to find. Every one of his people remember some interesting anecdote about which his characteristic wit and humor, or his gentleness, benevolence, and sanctity are conspicuous. May he live not only to see his golden jubilee in 1884, but many years after, as our glory and our pride in the future as he has been in the past!"

Mount Zion Methodist Episcopal (Colored) Church is one of the oldest organizations among the colored people in this city, being for many years (1827) holding services in different places until their church was built, situated in Division Street. It is with considerable difficulty to learn of the many pastors who have served this people. The Rev. Thomas Cuff took charge in 1879, and found a small membership, less than one hundred. The congregations are good, and the church accommodates about three hundred and fifty. They have quite a large Sabbath-school; Josiah Henson, superintendent.

St. James' Methodist Episcopal Church.—This church was organized from the First Methodist Episcopal Church about the year 1860. Their beautiful Gothic brick church, with steeple about one hundred and seventy-five feet in height, cost $75,000; located on the corner of Bayard and Schuyler Streets (now called St. James' Place); was dedicated Nov. 11, 1866.

The following is a list of pastors: Revs. John E. Cookman, D.D., 1860-61; Frank B. Rose, 1862-63; James R. Bryan, 1864-65; R. M. Strattan, D.D., 1866-67; Robert Laird Collier, D.D., 1868-69; John McClintock, D.D., LL.D.; Otis H. Tiffany, D.D.; William V. Kelly, A.M.; G. K. Morris, D.D.; Edward Wilson, D.D., 1877-78; John E. Adams, 1879-80; John E. Price, A.M., 1880-82. Trustees, James Bishop, Garret Conover, Joseph Fisher, Jr., William E. Kelley, J. H. Mattison, Christopher Meyer, R. G. Miller, G. W. Davies, J. G. Palmer. Stewards, J. O. Bedford, J. W. Fielder, J. J. Holland, William H. Mailler, H. S. Manning, G. B. Muun, G. B. Merri-man, W. S. Pettit, I. J. Schock. Financial Secretary, Joseph Fisher, Jr. Treasurer, William E. Kelley. Membership, 125; sittings, 450.

St. John's Evangelist Episcopal.—This church was organized in 1860. Their building is brick, situate on corner of George Street near Commercial Avenue, valued at $5000; accommodations, 300. The membership is one hundred and twenty. The first rector of this parish was Rev. E. B. Boggs, who remained for some four years, and whose labors in this new church were successful. The present rector, who came in 1869, is the Rev. Charles E. Phelps. Senior Warden, J. S. Carpenter; Junior Warden, W. G. Parsons; Vestrymen, J. N. Carpenter, Gen. J. B. McIntosh, W. Carpenter, J. Belcher, L. T. Ives, W. Ree. Swift, C. D. Deshler, E. B. Young, M.D., and C. E. D. Phelps.

Evangelical Lutheran Emmanuel (German) was organized from some of the members withdrawing from St. John's German Reformed. Their church situated on corner of New and Kirkpatrick Streets, built 1878. Rev. Mr. Berkemeyer was first pastor, 1877. The Rev. John A. Dewald became their pastor in 1878. Their membership is about 150; sittings, 500.

St. John German Reformed.—This organization, with sixty members, elected their trustees in 1861. They have the same confession of faith as the Reformed Church in this city. Their building is frame, valued at fifteen thousand dollars.

Their first pastor, in 1861-64, was Rev. A. Hoching. After he left the Rev. I. M. Steiner came and stayed one year. Their third pastor, Rev. Oscar Lohr, came in 1865 and stayed but a few months. Their present pastor, Rev. Charles Banks, was installed in 1868. Their present membership is two hundred and seventy. Their church, situated on corner of Albany and George Streets, has accommodations for five hundred.

Third Reformed (German) Church.—Organized in 1851. Their building is small, built in 1857, frame, situated in Guldin Street. The Rev. Prof. Carl Meyer, D.D., took charge in 1862. Their membership is small, numbering not over thirty. Sittings, two hundred. Their pastor, Dr. Meyer, is one of the professors in Rutgers Theological College.

Union African Methodist (Colored) Church.—This has been but lately organized, in 1879, and has but a small membership, about thirty-nine. Their pastor, Rev. E. H. Chippey, took charge in 1880, with the prospect of seeing an increased attendance upon the worship of this young society. There is a large colored population residents of this city who attend no church.

St. John the Baptist German Roman Catholic.—This church was organized in the year 1865. It is situated in Neilson Street, near Cannon, and accommodates about four hundred persons. The Rev. Henri T. Martens is the pastor, and took the charge in 1874, and also conducts the Sunday-school.

Colored Baptist Church.—In 1876 a number of colored people belonging to the First Church were organized by themselves. They worship in a brick building built for them by the First Church. They are now known as the Ebenezer Colored Baptist Church, situate in Hale Street near Lee Avenue. They have been supplied with regular services, and now (1881) have a membership of about eighty. The Rev. Archie G. Young took charge in 1880. The church accommodations, one hundred. Their Sunday-school superintendent, Hannibal Brown.

Second Baptist Church.—The subject of church extension had been agitated, but had been laid aside for the time. But a large number of the membership of the First Church desirous of having a new organization, March 16, 1872, a large plot of land was generously given by Deacon Van Wickle. A neat church was built thereon, on corner of Remsen Avenue and Redmond Street. Church accommodations, five hundred. A Sunday-school was established. This was the first start of the Remsen Avenue Baptist Church; now has nearly three hundred and fifty communicants. The Rev. A. E. Waffle, their pastor, has been zealous in all its enterprises. It now has a large Sabbath-school, an efficient band of workers, and has greatly helped the cause of evangelical religion in that part of the city. Frequent gracious visits of the spirit in revivals have gladdened all hearts. John T. Morgan was the first deacon, 1872, and is also the superintendent of Sabbath-school.

Rev. W. H. Marsh, pastor, 1881.

Evangelical Lutheran Emmanuel (German).—This church was organized in the year 1878, when Rev. John A. Dewald became their pastor. Their church, which will accommodate some five hundred, is situated on the corner of New and Kirkpatrick Streets. The president of the board of trustees is Mr. William Lins. This church, with a small membership and but five years old, is destined to be within a few years one of the largest German-speaking churches in the State. This society is growing, and the pastor has everything to encourage him in his efforts in building up this congregation.

Jewish Synagogue.—There are a few families resident in this city, but feeling an interest in having a synagogue organized in New Brunswick, and feeling that the distance and expense to New York on their Sunday (Saturday) was too much, they in the year 1861 organized a congregation in a hall Nos. 9 and 11 Peace Street, named the congregation of "Anshe Emett," "Man of Truth." Reader, Rev. Isaac Shick-len; President, William B. Plechner; Secretary, L. Oppen; and Treasurer, Aaron Wolfson.

Capt. Kidd.—It is stated that at an early day an organized attempt will be made to dig out a mysterious wreck recently discovered imbedded in the mud on the shores leading into the Raritan River, and it is now supposed to have been one of the privateers of Capt. Kidd, and the idea has been lately strengthened by the finding in the vicinity of several pieces of silver and copper coins and some strange-looking tools, evidently fashioned hundreds of years ago. It was in 1695 that adventurous privateers ripened into bold and merciless buccaneers and plunged right and left, regardless of the flag, which was supposed to be a guarantee of protection. The American coast swarmed with pirates. No vessel was safe upon the waters, and the ocean commerce was almost destroyed. New York merchant vessels were rifled and burned within sight of her shores, and the pirates even entered her harbors and seized her ships as they lay at anchor. A vessel was fitted out to secure if possible; "subscriptions were raised to stimulate the capture of this noted pirate, Capt. Kidd. Ballamont was Governor at this time, and his maxim was no quarter for pirates," and it was supposed that he would be found at anchor in the Raritan Bay, in some of its inlets, "as this was one of his rendezvous." The faith has descended to the present day, and the mention of "Kidd's Treasure" still suggests to credulous minds visions of untold wealth lying almost at their doors, awaiting only the vigorous application of the pick and shovel.

The result of Kidd's enterprise caused great excitement and indignation both in America and England, and Ballamont, Livingston, and even the king were openly accused of having secretly connived at it and shared in the spoils. A motion was made in the House of Commons that all who had been interested in the adventure should be deprived of their official positions, and this motion being lost by a large majority, the noblemen were impeached, and forced to undergo the form of a trial for their lives; but these charges against them could not be sustained, and all the accused were honorably discharged. The spot selected by Kidd for the burial of his treasures was along the Jersey shore, and the opinion is that vast treasures are buried near this city as well. The probably correct solution is that entertained in the early days, that Kidd's wife and daughter (he married a widow lady by name of Mrs. Sarah Oort, in New York City) knew of the location of the treasure, and that they secured the greater portion of it.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

STAATS CLARK.

His father, John Clark, was born Feb. 29, 1768, at Flemington, N. J., was a blacksmith, and while a young man settled in New Brunswick, where he worked at his trade for a time, and about 1800 established the iron-store on Peace Street in New Brunswick, which he carried on until his death, Nov. 14, 1815. His wife, Ellen Schuyler, belonged to the old Schnyler stock, who were among the first Holland settlers in New York and on the Hudson, and was born Feb. 20, 1776, married Feb. 12, 1795, was a devoted member of the Reformed Dutch Church, and died Dec. 27, 1844. The children of this union were Catharine, died young; Abraham S., born November, 1797, was a merchant in New Brunswick, and died Sept. 5, 1830; John, born April 20, 1800, succeeded his father in the iron business, which he carried on until 1863, then retired, and died in March, 1874; James, born Aug. 8, 1802, studied in New York for a physician, settled in New Brunswick, where he gave his attention mostly to business pursuits instead of his profession, and died Aug. 30, 1850; George, died young; George (2d), born May 22, 1807, was a merchant in New Brunswick during his active business life; Staats, born Nov. 4, 1809, subject of this sketch; Ira Condit, born April 2, 1812, was a lumber merchant in New Brunswick, and died May 22, 1865; and David, born Dec. 4, 1814, partner with his brother John in the iron trade, died October, 1863.

Staats Clark, in common with his brothers, inherited from his father habits of industry, economy, and a capacity for business, and probably no family has ever lived in New Brunswick whose members have so unanimously turned their attention to mercantile pursuits as that of the Clarks, and the iron business founded by the father about the beginning of the century was continued at the same place by his sons successively and grandson after his decease until 1881, a period of eighty-one years, and was in that year sold out to Philip Weigle. At the age of fifteen Staats Clark began a business life for himself, and for several years was a clerk in the dry-goods house of Beekman & Johnson, New York. Returning to his native city, he became a partner with James Van Nuys in the dry-goods trade on Church Street, where he remained until the death of his brother James, and then became a partner with his brother Ira Condit in the lumber trade. Upon the death of David, in 1863, he bought out the iron business, which had been carried on by his brothers, David and Ira Condit, and with his son John S. as a partner continued the business until 1874, when he retired from business, and left the iron business with his son John S., who, as before stated, sold it in 1881. Thus, for a period of a half-century, Mr. Clark was known in the business circles of the city, and always known as a man of strict integrity in all his business relations. He has never sought political place and never held office, but quietly and unostentatiously pursued the even tenor of his way as a business man. For several years he was a director in the Novelty Rubber Company of New Brunswick. In July, 1844, he married Sarah, daughter of Josiah Ford, of New Brunswick, who died May 7, 1852, aged thirty-seven years, leaving three children,—Ellen, born in October, 1845, died at the age of fourteen; Margaret is the wife of Henry De Mott, of Minneapolis; and John S. Clark, only son, before alluded to in this sketch.

GEORGE B. MUNN.

George B. Munn, master-mechanic and inventor, of New Brunswick, N. J., was born at West Stockbridge, Berkshire Co., Mass., July 16, 1831.

His paternal grandfather, Nathaniel, was an ingenious blacksmith of that county, and his ancestors on both his father and mother's side were among the early settlers of New England. His father, James, was a carriage manufacturer, and carried on his business in Massachusetts, Roxbury, N. Y., and removed during the latter part of his life to Shawano, Wis., where he died in 1868, aged about seventy-five years. His mother, Elvira Bidwell, died in 1844, aged about thirty years. One brother, Rev. Anson F. Munn, was graduated at Rutgers College in 1852, at the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church in 1856, was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick, and installed pastor of the Reformed Church of East New York, L. I., where he preached for twelve years. In 1867 he accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Reformed Church at Cocksackie, N. Y., where he labored until his decease in 1878, being at that time nearly fifty years of age. Another brother, Guy P. Munn, was a farmer and hat manufacturer of Prattsville, N. Y., where he died.

George B. Munn received little book knowledge during his boyhood, and on account of the limited means of his parents, he early in life learned that he must care for himself. At the age of ten years we find him making miniature saw-mills, windmills, and boxes, showing a genius and inventive talent, the development of which, after a quarter of a century, has given him an enviable place among the leading mechanicians and inventive geniuses of this country. At the age of sixteen, in 1847, he apprenticed himself to Harlow Taylor, of Prattsville, N. Y., where he was engaged in his machine-works and foundry for three years, and there he had charge of the works during his fourth year. In 1851, having made himself a trunk, he set out for Massachusetts, but stopped on his way at Philmont, N. Y., where he engaged with Whiting & Marshall, manufacturers of woolen machinery. After one year spent there, he was one year with Mackay & Hoadley, engine-builders, of Pittsfield, Mass. Young Munn's reputation may be said to have now been fully established, and his services began to be sought for to fill important and trustworthy places. He set up woolen machinery for Whiting & Marshall for a year, aided Taylor & Whiting, of Winsted, Conn., one year in perfecting machinery for the manufacture and setting of pins, and after a time spent with a Mr. Frink, the inventor, he went to Norfolk by request, and for one year and a half was closeted with E. E. Kilbourn in working up an invention in knitting machinery, for the manufacture of full-fashioned goods. At this time such work was only done by hand, and mostly in England. The result of their united labors was "Kilbourn's Patent Automatic Knitting-machine," which with its improvements has been largely controlled since by the "Norfolk Hosiery Company" and the "Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company." Mr. Munn then manufactured knitting machinery for the Norfolk Hosiery Company until some time after the war broke out, and for two years thereafter he was engaged with Welsh, Brown & Co. in the manufacture of guns for the war.

In 1867 he came to New Brunswick, and took charge of the Norfolk and New Brunswick Hosiery Company's machinery department, which he superintended until 1869, when he formed a partnership with his old fellow-laborer, E. E. Kilbourn, under the firm-name of G. B. Munn & Co. One year thereafter, Messrs. Johnson Letson, L. P. Porter, Jonathan Earle, and E. E. Kilbourn joined with him in the formation of the "New Brunswick Machine Company," which continued operations for two years, being succeeded by Mr. Munn alone, who changed the name to the "Empire Machine-Works," and has continued sole owner and proprietor of them since.

Mr. Munn's specialty is the manufacture of knitting machinery, yet he manufactures steam-engines, seaming-machines, fine machinery of all kinds, and constructs models for patents, works up patent-rights from inventors' crude ideas, etc. The reputation of the Empire Machine-Works stands second to none in the United States, and here have been manufactured hundreds of knitting-machines for the local industry and for shipment to all parts. He is the only builder of these knitting-machines, and owns all the patterns.

Mr. Munn is an indefatigable worker, and an enthusiast in his profession, and always acts as his own superintendent, foreman, and draughtsman, thus giving the benefit of his life's work, by advice and direction, to every piece of machinery that is manufactured at his works. His identification with all local enterprises of a worthy nature, both by encouragement morally and as a contributor, has made him favorably known in New Brunswick. He became a member of the Masonic fraternity in 1862, and since his residence here he has been identified as a member of Union Lodge, No. 19, of Scott Chapter, No. 4, is officially connected with the St. James Methodist Episcopal Church, and is freeholder from the Fifth Ward.

Mr. Munn has taken a somewhat active part in political matters, and cast his first vote in 1856 with the Republican party. He was twice a delegate to State conventions in which Governor Buckingham was nominated each time, and assistant secretary of one. He was elected freeholder of the Fifth Ward of the city in 1881, and re-elected in 1882. Upon the breaking out of the rebellion, he assisted in the organization of companies, and was offered a commission by Governor Buckingham, but declined in favor of the more useful service of manufacturing guns for the government. He has been a member of the National Guard of New Jersey for ten years, has been commissioned four times by the Governors of the State, and is in 1882 judge-advocate of the Third Regiment, N. G. N. J.

He has been twice married, his present wife being S. Louise, daughter of John Anderson, of Dayton, Middlesex Co., N. J.

GARRET CONOVER.

Garret Conover, clothing merchant of New Brunswick, N. J., was born at Hightstown, Mercer Co., N. J., Feb. 3, 1817. The name was originally spelled "Covenhoven" in Holland, and the progenitor of the family in America was Wolfert Gerretson Von Covenhoven, who, with his three sons, Jacob (died in 1670), Gerret (born 1610, died 1645), and Peter, came from near Amersfoort, Holland, in 1630, and settled on Long Island. Gerret is the paternal ancestor of our subject, married Cornelia Lambertson Cool, and reared two sons, William Gerret and John, and two daughters, Nellie and Marijje. William Gerret married Altie Brinckerhoff, and had one son, Gerret, who married Janet Montfoort, who bore him twelve children, of whom John married Coba Vanderveer and removed to Monmouth Co., N. J., where they reared a family of eight children, of whom William, the eldest son, was great-grandfather of our subject, and was born Oct. 25, 1705. He married Catherine Lane, born May 16, 1709, who bore him nine sons and two daughters, of whom Peter was grandfather of our subject, and was born Oct. 18, 1743. His wife was Phebe Dey, born Nov. 18, 1748, who bore him six sons and four daughters. Of these children, John P. Conover was the father of Garret, was born Oct. 3, 1778, and died in the winter of 1832. His wife was Lydia Duncan, a native of Cranbury, born in March, 1777, and died Aug. 1, 1851. Their children were Stephen, born April 17, 1801, was a school-teacher, surveyor, and farmer, and died in 1836; Peter, born Jan. 14, 1803, was a farmer in Hunterdon County, and died about 1854; John D., born Aug. 5, 1804, resided in New Brunswick, was a shoe manufacturer, and died about 1850; David, born March 25, 1805, was a cabinet-maker at Hightstown, where he died April 8, 1870; Margaret, born Dec. 5, 1807, is the wife of David Hill, of Mercer County; Catherine, born Feb. 1, 1810, wife of Peter Selover, of South Amboy; Lettie, born Dec. 3, 1812, wife of Richard

White, and resides at Robbinsville, N. J.; Thomas D., born Nov. 12, 1813, died in 1879; Garret, subject of this sketch; Phebe, born Jan. 29, 1819, wife of Peter V. Voorhees, both deceased; George S., born Dec. 20, 1821, a merchant in Brooklyn, L. I.; Joseph D., born Oct. 6, 1823, was a farmer, and resided near Bordentown, where he died.

Garret Conover spent his early boyhood at home. At the age of twelve he came to New Brunswick, and was apprenticed to learn the tailor's trade with William Owen, and at that youthful age started out in life for himself, and since his beginning in 1829 he has been continuously identified with the clothing trade in New Brunswick. He came to New Brunswick without money, but he learned that industry and economy form the basis of wealth and success. He finished learning his trade with John Stryker, who left the place in 1835.

In 1836, Mr. Conover resolved to start business for himself as a merchant tailor, and accordingly established himself on Commerce Square, where, after he had been in business about one year, his goods were destroyed by fire, leaving him in debt. The confidence of New York merchants from whom he purchased his goods in his integrity and honesty of purpose enabled him at once to start again, and from that time his trade rapidly increased until in 1851 he added to his business the manufacture and sale of clothing, which he has carried on successfully since. He purchased his property for a residence on Albany Street in 1845, and kept store near by on the same street, and in 1851 purchased property and established his business at 33 Church Street, on the opposite side of the block, where he continues to do business in 1882. For several years Mr. Conover has dealt quite largely in real estate, and through his business owns a fine estate of desirable property in the city. He has served on the board of chosen freeholders of Middlesex County, and was elected mayor of New Brunswick on the Democratic ticket, and served in that capacity in 1874 and 1875. He has been identified with several local enterprises in the city, and served for ten years as a member of the board of education, and for several years as president of the building and loan association. He is a member of St. James' Methodist Episcopal Church, and president of its board of trustees. He married in 1838 Ann Louisa Wetsel. Their children are Caroline, deceased; Joanna, died at the age of twenty-six; George, died at the age of twenty-four; Wesley Hudson, Charles, and Garret, in business with their father; Emma, deceased; Howard William, died at the age of twenty-six; and Katie. Four generations of Mr. Conover's ancestors resided near Hightstown, where he was born, and were farmers.

NORTH BRUNSWICK.¹

Situation and Boundaries, etc.—As originally surveyed, North Brunswick contained an area of 23,000 acres, of which 5000 were unimproved. By the organization, partially from its territory, of the township of East Brunswick and the separation of New Brunswick from it, the former extent of the township was reduced to 8256 acres, and most of the formerly unimproved land has been put under cultivation. North Brunswick is bounded north by New Brunswick, east by East Brunswick, south by South Brunswick, and west by Franklin township, Somerset County.

The population of North Brunswick, according to the last census, was 1251.

In 1880 the assessed value of real estate was $496,380; amount of deduction therefrom, mortgages, $19,850. The value of personal property was $120,170; amount of deduction therefrom, notes, $1825. The total amount of real and personal property taxed, including mortgages and notes, was $638,257. The rate of tax for State purposes was $2 per $100; the rate of tax for county purposes was $6.10 per $1000; and the rates of tax for local purposes was as follows: for incidental expenses, $0.60 per $1000; for the maintenance of the poor, $1.60 per $1000; for road construction and repairs, $1.10 per $1000. The whole amount of tax ordered to be raised, including a special school tax, a poll tax, and a tax on dogs, was $7833.73. The expenditures during the previous fiscal year amounted to $400 for incidental expenses, $1000 for the maintenance of the poor, and $700 for road construction and repairs.

Physical Features.—The surface of this township is level. The soil is red shale and sandy loam, and much of it is under a high state of cultivation; the drainage being provided by Lawrence's Brook on the east, One-Mile Run on the west, and in the southern part and centrally by Oakley's or "Cow Yard" Brook and other tributaries to Lawrence's Brook. The latter is by far the largest and most important stream washing any part of the township. It has its source in South Brunswick, and flowing in a northeasterly course separates North Brunswick from East Brunswick, emptying into the Raritan at the eastern extremity of the city of New Brunswick; and at Milltown and at Brookford, just above, affords excellent water-power, which has been employed for manufacturing purposes since early in the history of the country south of the Raritan. The Trenton and New Brunswick turnpike traverses the town in a direct line from the northeast to the southwest, west of the centre, and George's road of historical fame has its deviating course in the same general direction near the eastern boundary. The Princeton and Brunswick turnpike forms the western boundary of the township, the dwellings on the west side of that thoroughfare being in Somerset County. One branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad crosses North Brunswick from near its northern to its southern extremity, with a flag station, known as Adams, within the township. The branch railroad to Millstone has its junction with the Pennsylvania Railroad near the northwest corner.

Settlement.—Much that would be interesting concerning the early settlement of this township has long since been buried in the grave of the past, and no clue remains by which it can be brought to light. The ancient Reformed Dutch Church at Three-Mile Run was doubtless the earliest outgrowth of civilization within the present borders of North Brunswick, and it is so much a thing of the past that it is not improbable that some of the present residents of the township are ignorant that it ever existed. At Three-Mile Run was first planted the banner of Christianity in that portion of Middlesex County south of the Raritan. The interesting story of a long struggle to establish a permanent church there and its final abandonment is told by Dr. Steele in an historical discourse published in 1867. It is published in this work in connection with the history of the First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick, to which the reader is referred.

"The names of the following persons are attached to a subscription designed to raise means to import a minister from Holland in 1703: Dollius Hageman, Teunis Quick, Hend. Emens, Thos. Cort, Jac. Probasco, Neclas Wyckoff, Mic. L. Moor, John Schede-meun, Nec. Van Dyke, John Van Houten, Wil. Bennet, Folkert Van Nostrand, Jac. Bennet, Hend. Fauger, Ab. Bennet, Cor. Peterson, Philip Folkerson, —avi L. Draver, George Anderson, Stabel Probasco, Isaac Le Priere, Simon Van Wicklen, Cobas Benat, Garret Cotman, Lucas Covert, Wil. Van Duyn, Dennis Van Duyn, John Folkerson, Jost Banat."—Hon. Ralph Voorhees, Middlebush.

It is not probable that many members of the Three-Mile Run, and later of the New Brunswick Church, resided within the limits of North Brunswick as now bounded. Many of the family names are familiar ones in the township to-day, however, and it is certain that some few present residents are able to trace their descent from those whose labors and strifes in the cause of Christianity have been depicted. A majority of representatives of pioneer families are of Holland Dutch descent, and the old families, through successive generations, have intermarried with each other till they form practically one family. It is worthy of note, too, that these families have all along been identified, with few individual exceptions, with the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, the continuation, in a certain sense, of the historical church which centred at the old house of worship at Three-Mile Run and sowed the

One of the oldest families of North Brunswick is the family of Voorhees,¹ descended from one or more of several members of the original family in America, who came from Long Island to New Brunswick and vicinity at an early date. Who was the first settler of the name in the township is not ascertainable. An early resident, who was contemporary with others of that name there, was (1) John G. Voorhees, who lived on a farm adjoining Henry Van Liew's and died in 1800, leaving two daughters. These were named Catharine and Helena. (2) Catharine became the wife of John Voorhees and died before he did, leaving a son named Peter, who died some time ago at Princeton, where he lived. (3) John Voorhees remarried, and afterwards had two sons,—Craig, a silversmith, resident at New Brunswick, and Stephen, who was killed during the late war. (4) Helena married Dennis Vanderbilt.

Jeremiah Voorhees was many years ago a resident near Bodine's Corners. He was a wheelwright by trade, and married Margaret Outcalt. His daughter Catharine died in 1804, and his son Frederick only twelve days before. Abbie, one of his daughters, married Nicholas DeHart. Another, called Gettie Ann, became Mrs. Dennis Bodine. None of his sons are living.

John S. Voorhees, who died in 1877, was of the eighth generation of descendants of Stephen Coert, and his father was the fourth (1) Peter in the line of descent. The latter married Jane Schenck, and was a prominent resident of North Brunswick. The children of (2) John S. Voorhees were A. DeHart, Peter, John S., Jr., and Anna M. A. DeHart and Anna M. live on the homestead, and Peter and John S., Jr., are lawyers at New Brunswick and in Canada respectively.

(1) Jaques Van Liew was an early resident on the Henry Van Liew place. He married Maria Voorhees, dying in 1810, she in 1824. Their children were Henry and Garret Van Liew. (2) Henry married Ann H., daughter of Enos Ayres, who survives him, and lived on the farm previously occupied by his father. (3) Garret Van Liew was also a farmer, living on George's road, and died some years since. His son, Jacques Van Liew, died on his father's farm at a recent date.

(1) Nicholas Bodine, blacksmith, is said to have been the first of the name at Bodine's Corners. His best-known son, (2) Cornelius, lived on his father's place after the latter's death, and died an old man some time before 1850. His sons, who lived and were known in the township, were Abraham, Dennis, and John. Others died early in the present century. Abraham, a farmer and speculator, for a time kept a hotel in New Brunswick, and died of the cholera in 1849. Dennis was a wheelwright, and passed his life at Bodine's Corners, where he died a few years ago. John is a farmer, and lives near New Brunswick.

(1) Frederick Outcalt was an early resident in the vicinity of Bodine's Corners, and died there at an advanced age in 1818. His sons, Frederick, Henry, John, and Richard, were well known. (2) Frederick lived at Three-Mile Run, and died there about fifteen years ago, very old, leaving two sons, Jacob and Frederick. (3) Henry removed to New Brunswick, and died there twenty-five or thirty years ago. His sons were Frederick, Jacob, John, and Richard. Jacob and John are living in New Brunswick. (4) John found a home in Ohio in 1820, revisited the place of his nativity about 1866, and returned to Ohio and died there. His family all live in the West. (5) Richard was a farmer, and spent his life on his father's homestead, dying there past ninety. John, Henry, and Frederick are names of his sons. John and Henry are West. Frederick lives in New Brunswick.

The Vanderbilt family has become firmly rooted to the soil of North Brunswick by several generations' residence. The first there of the name of whom their descendants have any knowledge were two brothers, Cornelius and Jeromus. (1) Cornelius owned the farm now known as the John Brush place, and died in 1800. He had a son (1) Dennis, and a daughter (2) Johannah.

(1) Dennis married Helena, daughter of John G. Voorhees. Their children were John, Cornelius, James C., Dennis, Henry, Garret, Catharine, and Johannah Jane. John died in 1824, at the age of twenty-one. (2) Cornelius married a Tunison, and had sons Cornelius, William, and Dennis; Cornelius lives in New York; William died in 1881; Dennis lives in New Brunswick. (3) James C. married Sarah, daughter of Luke and sister of Matthew Edgerton, and is living, at the age of seventy-two, on George's road. (4) Dennis went West, and married and died there. (5) Henry lives in New York, and married there. (6) Garret G. is living in New York, unmarried. (7) Catharine married John Bergen, of Milltown, and is dead. (8) Johannah Jane is married and living in Raritan.

(2) Johannah married Cornelius Bodine.

Jeromus Vanderbilt, brother of Cornelius, Sr., early lived near Milltown, subsequently removing to New Brunswick, where he owned property and died nearly half a century since.

(1) John Ryder was one of the early comers. His sons, John, Bernardus, and Stephen Ryder, all lived on Lawrence's Brook, in the northwestern part of the township, early in the present century. (2) John had sons,—William, now living on the place where his father died, and Stephen, now of East Brunswick. (3) Bernardus was a bachelor, and has been dead about fifty years. (3) Stephen has been dead forty years, and none of his descendants are in the township. The Ryder property is a portion of the three-thousand-acre tract, embracing the brook, once owned by Thomas Lawrence, and which came into the possession of Cornelius Longfield and Governor Barclay in 1689. John Ryder, Sr., bought one hundred and forty-two acres of Longfield in 1741, and from him it passed to his heirs.

(1) Martin Stevenson located early where his son, the late Peter Stevenson, lived and died. John, his eldest son, has been dead some time. (2) Peter married Mary, a daughter of Jeremiah Voorhees. After her death he married the daughter of an early resident at Cheesquake. (3) Barent Stevenson, son of Peter, married a daughter of James Edgerton, and is a well-known citizen.

A man named Runyan lived for many years opposite Peter Stevenson's, in a house which has long since disappeared, and had two sons, named Reuben and Walter. The former removed to New Brunswick and spent his days there, the latter lived on his father's homestead on George's road until 1849, when he died of cholera.

(1) Cornelius Tunison came about 1765, and though he was not a land-owner was a farmer of repute, renting land. His family consisted of Cornelius, John, Caroline, and Mary Ann. (2) Cornelius married and had a large family. (3) John married a Miss Walker and removed to Ohio. (4) Caroline married William Brookfield, a stone-cutter, of New Brunswick. (5) Mary Ann became the wife of Jacob De Hart, of North Brunswick.

James Bennit was a settler in the southwestern part of the township considerably earlier than 1800, and reared a large family. His sons, John, James, and Daniel, are men of families residing in the vicinity.

At an early date (1) Capt. Jehu Dunham located in the township, and later removed to East Brunswick, where he remained until his death in 1841, past eighty. His wife was Eleanor Van Tine, born in 1767, who died in 1737. Their children were Elizabeth, David, James, Lewis, William, and Abraham, and all of the sons were useful citizens. (1) Elizabeth, born in 1792, married Nicholas Rappleyea and died in 1857. (2) David, born in 1794, married Jane Wilson and died in 1840. (3) James, born in 1796, married Eleanor Peterson and died in 1872. (4) Lewis, born in 1799, married Mary Perry and died in 1843. (5) William was born in 1801 and died in 1863. (6) Abraham was born in 1802. Rev. Dr. Ira Condict, fourth pastor of the First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick, in 1798 removed to a farm of one hundred and thirteen acres near Milltown, late the property of Henry H. Booraem, but still known as the Condict farm.

Christian and Simeon Van Nortwick lived near

Lawrence's Brook early in the history of settlements and clearings thereabouts. The former had quite a family, including Christopher, Jr., John, and Cornelia. Christopher, Jr., married a daughter of Archibald Gordon, of Machaponix; John, a blacksmith, removed to Englishtown.

(1) Cornelius De Hart in 1720 settled at the upper forks of Six-Mile Run, in the present township of North Brunswick, purchasing two hundred and ten acres of land of the Indians, which he was afterward compelled to repurchase of the proprietors, paying therefor a second time. He had a number of children. Some of his sons died early. Those who survived were named Cornelius, Guisbert, and Abraham. After the death of the pioneer, (2) Cornelius, Jr., owned and lived on one-third of his late father's property, now in the possession of Charles Dunham (Guisbert and Abraham owning the remaining two-thirds), living in the house his father had erected, and which with additions which have been made to it from time to time is now the residence of the widow and family of the late John S. Voorhees. (3) Guisbert never married. (4) Abraham married Sarah, daughter of John Van Cleef, Sr., and died in 1832, his wife surviving till 1844. (5) Sarah, one of the daughters of Cornelius De Hart, Sr., married Roeloff Voorhees, grandfather of Abraham D. Voorhees, of Adams Station. (6) Another daughter married Jacobus De Hart.

The children of (4) Abraham were as follows: (1) John, who married Anna Ayers and died in 1819; (2) Cornelius, who died in 1805; (3) Moyce, who married Peter P. Van Doren, of Somerset County, and died in 1857. The children of the last mentioned were Margaret and Sarah Ann, the latter being the widow of John S. Voorhees, and now in possession of the old De Hart homestead.

The Indians were often attracted to the neighborhood of Cornelius De Hart, Sr.'s pioneer home by the various kinds of game with which the neighborhood abounded, including deer. Mr. De Hart was a successful deer-hunter. Behind his barn he kept a decoy doe, by whose presence susceptible bucks were lured within range of his monster shot-gun. This weapon has been preserved in the family as a relic. It is doubtless two hundred years old, and is nearly eight feet long, and weighs fifteen pounds.

(1) Powe De Hart lived on Lawrence's Brook, and was identified with the earlier history of the township. His wife, Dinah Bodine, died in 1815. They had several children, among whom were Cornelius, Jacob, Henry, and Nicholas.

(2) Cornelius was a carpenter and died many years ago. His son William lives in East Brunswick. (3) Jacob died recently in the township. His son, Samuel B. How, is a resident of Long Island; Jacob, another son, is living in Milltown. (4) Henry is a cabinet-maker of New Brunswick. (5) Nicholas, a railway conductor, was killed by the cars.

Harle Farmer, a native of the township, was the son of an early settler. He was for many years a prominent agriculturist and dealer in ship-timber, dying past eighty a few years since, and leaving numerous descendants. The names of Verdine E. and Arnold Farmer, Jr., are familiar as those of leading citizens.

In 1816, (1) Thomas Letson, from New Brunswick, purchased and located on the Letson farm. His children were John S., Warren, Lewis G., Johnson, Maria, and Henry. (2) John S. located in New Brunswick early in life and engaged in tanning. He married Letitia Brunson. Their children were Mary F., Ann, Sarah, William, Julia, Louisa, and Thomas W., the latter now living on the Letson homestead. (3) Warren was long in government employ. (4) Lewis G. became a farmer in North Brunswick. (5) Johnson located in New Brunswick, was a merchant there, and is now president of the New Brunswick Rubber Company. (6) Maria married and has been dead many years.

Enos Ayres came from Metuchen about 1800 and bought land near the Black Horse Tavern. Later he removed to the Trenton turnpike, and lived there until his death in 1835.

Jacob I. Bergen was early at Milltown, and owned the old grist-mill there early in the century, and was for a time a prominent merchant and business man.

Peter Gordon was living in the vicinity of Milltown in 1800 or a little later. His sons were Jacques Van Lieu Gordon, deceased, once sheriff of Middlesex County, and Archibald, living near Milltown.

Nicholas Booraem was an early wheelwright and millwright at Milltown. He had sons,—Jonathan, Henry, and Nicholas. Jonathan was a millwright and ship-builder, and early established a ship-yard at Washington, in East Brunswick, which is now the property of his son Nicholas. Nicholas was county collector, 1825-68, and county clerk of Middlesex County, 1833-57. Theodore B. Booraem, the latter's son, was county collector in 1872 and 1873.

James CUNET was an early blacksmith at Bodine's Corners. Subsequently he removed to Washington, and for a time he lived there, and returned to North Brunswick, where he died. Some of his descendants are well known in North Brunswick and adjoining townships.

The names of Williamson, Buckalew, Vanderveer, Snedeker, and Messeroll have long been prominent among those of residents and office-holders in East Brunswick. Isaac J. Williamson is mentioned early in the records, and William A., Nelson S., Lucius, and John W. Williamson are referred to therein at a more recent date. The Buckalew family have long been both numerous and well known in North Brunswick and the country surrounding. The names of Peter O. Buckalew and others are familiar to elderly citizens. Probably the most prominent present citizen of the name is Frederick S. Buckalew. Thomas Vanderveer was a township officer in 1881. Richard Snedeker's name appears at a comparatively early date. Garret I. Snedeker, once a resident here, lives in East Brunswick. David P. Messeroll has figured more or less prominent in local affairs during recent years.

Civil History.—North Brunswick was among the first townships organized, immediately after the erection of Middlesex County and the permanent establishment of the local government of the same. It was formerly embraced within the borders of the ancient township of Piscataway, and early in the present century was referred to in the township records of North Brunswick as the North Ward of New Brunswick, but since 1803 it has been uniformly mentioned therein by the name now so familiar.

Until 1860 New Brunswick was within the township limits of North Brunswick, and the annual town-meetings were generally held there. By an act of Assembly, approved Feb. 28, 1860, New Brunswick was separated from North Brunswick, and a large section of the township set off to form a portion of East Brunswick, then erected. It was enacted that at ten o'clock A.M. on the first Tuesday in the ensuing May the town committees of North Brunswick, New Brunswick, and East Brunswick should meet at the public-house of Saxon M. Tice, in East Brunswick, to adjust all the mutual interests of the said townships, and effect an equitable division of the assets and liabilities of the former township of North Brunswick between North Brunswick, New Brunswick, and East Brunswick, on the basis of the proportion borne by the population and amount of taxable property of each of the parts of the townships set off to the whole population and amount of taxable property of North Brunswick as previously bounded.

The western boundary line of North Brunswick, formed by the Princeton and New Brunswick turnpike, separating it from Franklin township, Somerset County, has at times been slightly changed in places by local alterations in the course of the road, which, as so altered, was subsequently declared the township and county boundary line.

THE TOWNSHIP RECORDS.—The earliest township records of North Brunswick are contained in a book devoted to the preservation of the minutes of the successive town-meetings, and date back to the year 1800. The first entry in the said book, on a page numbered "1," is as follows:

"No of Votes given for Representatives in Congress for the State of New Jersey, in the North Ward of New Brunswick, at an Election held the 23^d and 24th of December, 1800, for the Seventh Congress:

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ANNUAL TOWN-MEETING, 1801.—The earliest town-meeting recorded was that of 1801, the minutes of which begin on page "2" of the record, and read as follows:

"At a Town-meeting held at the Court-House on the 2d Monday in April, 1801, for the North Ward of New Brunswick, the following persons were by plurality of votes chosen officers for the ensuing year, viz.:

"Abraham Schuyler, President; Jacob Dunham, Town Clerk.

"The Town Committee report that they have examined the accounts and vouchers of the collector & Overseer of the Poor, do report the same to be accurate, and find by the same a balance a ballance of three hundred and ninety-two Dollars & 63 Cents due from the township to William Ten Brook, the said collector and overseer, and that he has prosecuted Elisha Cox, late constable, for the sum of £13 3 6, deficiency remaining in his hands of the year 1799, and reports that there is no probability of recovering the said sum.

"Ordered, that the sum of £500 be raised for the use of the Poor for the ensuing year, equal to $1333.³³/₁₀₀.

"Ordered, that the sum of £500 be raised for the use of the Roads, equal to $1333.³³/₁₀₀.

"Ordered, that the above-mentioned sums be raised by the 15th of May, 1801.

"A communication from the township of Franklin, in the county of Somerset, requesting the senses of this Township on the subject of erecting a Poor-House for the joint benefit of the counties of Somerset and Middlesex, It was agreed that this Town will unite with the other towns in sd Counties to effect under such regulations & on such principles as may be deemed just & equitable.

"Elijah Phillips, Assessor; John Van Nuise, Isaac Williamson, Surveyors of the Highway; John Neilson, Benjamin Taylor, Freeholders; John Dennis, Senr., David Voorhees, Nicholas Bodine, William Lawson, Commissioners of Appeal; John Whitlock, Daniel Brinson, Samuel Carlile, Jephtha Cheeseman, Constables; William Tenbrook, Overseer of the Poor and Collector; Abraham Schuyler, Judge of Election; Nicholas Booraen, William Tenbrook, Abm Benoit, Pound-Keepers; Abraham Schuyler, James Schureman, James Benoit, Abraham Blauvelt, William Lawson, Town Committee.

"The above were appointed a Committee to Settle with the Several Town officers and report Annually, stating at the Town-meeting in their report the amount of all moneys expended for the use of the Town, and specifying the purpose to which they were applied.

"Resolved, That the several town officers exhibit their accounts and Vouchers to said committee for settlement at least Ten days previous to the next annual town meeting.

"OVERSEERS OF THE ROADS."

"1. John Van Harlingen, from John Messeroll's to the end of the town lane, and from thence to Lyle's Bridge.

"2. Robert Boggs, from Matthew Slight's corner to the mouth of Georges, and from thence to Reuben Runyon's bridge, as well as the Road from James Richmond's to Queen street, and also the road from the late Johannah Wilson's to the dutch church, together with that piece of road from the mouth of the drift (?) road to the Post road that leads to the 3-mile Run, likewise including George and Prince Street, and from Prince Street to Henry Guest's.

"Nicol. Smith, from John Messeroll's brook to Benjamin Taylor's Mills.

"4. Nicholas Bodine, from Nicholas Van Brint's Mills to Nicholas Van Harlingen's brook, and also the lane that leads to the 3-mile run, as far as Van Sickle's fields.

"John Dennis, Senr., of the road from Van Harlingen's Brook to Cornell's brook.

"6. Abraham Benoit, from Cornell's Brook to Oakley's brook.

"7. John Dunham, from Taylor's Mills to Runyon Bucklew's, and from thence to the landing formerly Robert Eastburn's, and from thence to Stanlie's brook; likewise that piece of road beginning on James Commeline's lands and John Norman's, & from thence to the end of McKee's lane.

"8. Jacob Stults, from Runyon Bucklew's to the old bridge, and from thence to the post road to James Hay's; also the new road from the end of McKee's lane to the post road.

"9. Lewis Johnson, of the road beginning from Johnson Voorhees' Bars; thence to Sparling's Tavern; then to Jonathan McKee's lane, and from Sparling's to the Post road, then beginning on the road laid out by Act of Assembly to McDowell's tavern, where it crosses the old Post road; thence down the same to James Hay's road; then beginning at the Post road near Pondwater's field, leading to Abraham Berkellew's landing, as far as James Hay's road.

"10. Winant D. Hart, from Van Brunt's to Peter Sparling's Tavern, and the road from Archibald Thompson's blacksmith-shop to Sanlie's brook.

"11. Jacobus D. Hart, from George's road to Freeland's brook.

"12. Jacob Dunham, of the Road called Great Post road, as far as the old corporation line; also Church Street Barrack and George Street too Prince Street.

"13. Simon Addis, from the Corporation line to the Six-mile Run.

(Signed) "JACOB DUNHAM, CLK."

The proceedings of the annual town-meetings of the years 1811-14 are not recorded, and the names of township officers chosen during that period cannot be ascertained.

Below is as complete a civil list as the records would aid the writer to make. The names of chosen freeholders elected previous to 1801 were obtained from the records of the board of freeholders of Middlesex County:

The Care of the Poor.—The first formal provision for the poor in North Brunswick of which there is any mention in the records was made in 1802. At the annual town-meeting held on the second Monday in April that year the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, that for the ensuing year a committee be appointed to rent a house in behalf of this township, and that the poor of the town be collected and maintained in said house at the expense of the town and under the superintendence of the said committee, who are further authorized to employ them in such useful labor as in their discretion they may think advantageous, and provide such attendance and supplies as may tend to their comfort and support." William Lawson, John Baker, John Plum, Robert Eastburn, and John Neil were appointed to carry the above resolution into effect. It was ordered that $1200 be raised "for the use of the poor." Also that the above-mentioned committee should "be allowed the same compensation as the township committee." At the annual town-meeting of 1803 it was ordered "that the overseer of the poor be permitted to call one person to his assistance to superintend the business of the poor-house, and that a compensation be allowed him for his services by the township committee, and for advice he shall call on the said committee from time to time."

At the annual town-meeting of 1804, in the annual financial report of the township committee, appeared the following charges on account of the maintenance of the poor:

For the maintenance of 12 poor in the poor-house.....	$506.30
For maintaining 8 poor out of the poor-house.....	482.93
Necessaries furnished sundry poor persons.....	37.24

At this time it was ordered that $1026 "poor money" be raised. In 1805, upon the expense of maintaining the poor during the preceding year, the township committee reported as follows:

"It appears to your committee that there have been supported in the poor-house 10 adult paupers and three children for the whole year past, 2 adult paupers and 5 children for three months, and 1 adult pauper for six weeks,—all in the poor-house for the sum of $870, and that four adult paupers have been supported out of the poor-house the whole year for the sum of $263.50."

In 1805, $1000 "poor money" was ordered to be raised, $800 in 1806, and $1250 in 1807. In 1808 $1500 was ordered raised "for the support of the poor, building small bridges, and for incidental expenses." In 1809 the allotment of "poor money" was $1000; in 1810, $14,000. The mode of supporting the poor, which, as is indicated, had prevailed from 1801 to 1810, does not seem to have been found satisfactory during the next five years. Whether it was changed in the interval cannot be ascertained, there being no record of township business from 1810 to 1815, but at the annual meeting of the last-named year it was

"Resolved, That a special committee be appointed to report to a future township meeting to be called on the second Monday in June ensuing the best place of supporting the poor of this township, and that John H. Lain, Thomas Hance, and Phineas Mundy be that committee."

The annual expense of maintaining the poor seems to have about doubled since 1810, as it was found necessary this year to authorize the raising of $2500 for such use during the ensuing twelve months. At the special meeting appointed, held in the court-house in New Brunswick, June 12, 1815, the committee reported as follows:

"The committee appointed by the last town-meeting to investigate and report to the adjourned meeting of said township on the propriety of changing the mode of supporting the poor of the township beg leave to submit for consideration the following statement, obtained by them from persons to whom the poor of the township of Woodbridge are intrusted, it being, as he informed us, the result of five years' experience:

1st. For rent of farm.....	$180
2d. To the persons having the care of the poor and working the farm.....	200
3d. Firewood.....	100
4th. Doctors' bills.....	20

which leaves a surplus of $100, which has generally been sufficient for all the incidental expenses. When the institution was first established they purchased 3 cows, one of which was for a beef, 8 sheep, a wagon and horses, and farming utensils. . . . Their stock has increased to 5 milch cows, and one for beef, 1 yoke of oxen and (1) pair of young cattle, 20 ewes, and 17 lambs; they have 4 hogs and plenty of poultry; they have now on hand upwards of 100 bushels of corn, a great sufficiency of rye, wheat, and other grain to support them, and salt meat and vegetables to spare. Your committee had the satisfaction of seeing the comfortable manner in which the poor were supported, the cleanliness and good order that prevailed, and the industry of those that were able to labor, and they are satisfied that if the whole township had been present they would cheerfully, in compassion to the poor, adopt a similar mode. Your committee recommend the purchase or renting of a farm on which the poor may be supported as a committee to be appointed may recommend;

Calculating the interest of a farm that would cost $9000 at 7 per cent.....	$420
Hire of an overseer.....	300
Doctors' bills and incidental expenses will make.....	280
	$1000

which is calculated much higher than in Woodbridge, and will leave a clear gain to the township of $1500, an object well worth the consideration of the township, as no one of us can tell where we shall stop whilst the present mode is pursued."

The following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, That the report be referred to the next annual town-meeting for their consideration.

"Resolved, That James Schureman and Staats Van Deursen be a committee, with the present members, to investigate on what terms a farm may be rented or purchased for the use of the township, and report to the next annual town-meeting."

At the annual town-meeting of 1816 the committee reported:

"The committee appointed to investigate on what terms a farm can be rented or purchased for the accommodation and support of the poor do report that they have ascertained that there are three or four farms for sale in the township, either of which would be convenient and suitable, that the prices are from $45 to $60 per acre; that y^r committee would recommend the purchase of a farm in preference to renting. And in order to carry the proposed plan into speedy operation, they do advise that a select committee be appointed at this meeting to purchase a farm and such stock and farming utensils as are necessary.

In compliance with the recommendation of the committee, James Schureman, Thomas Hance, Staats Van Deursen, Squire Martin, and Jan Van Nuis were appointed a committee to carry into effect the object of the report. The following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, That $10,000 be appropriated by the township for the purchase of a farm for the support of the poor, and that the committee be authorized to purchase such a farm within that sum as shall in their opinion answer the object in view, and that the sum of $2000 be raised by tax on the township for the present year to answer the first payment, and that such farther sum shall be raised annually as shall be sufficient to meet the successive payments as they become due.

"Resolved, That the sum of $700 be raised on the township for purchasing such implements of husbandry, cattle, furniture, etc., as may be wanting on said farm.

"Resolved, That $2000 be raised for the support of the poor for the present year."

At a township-meeting held at the court-house April 14, 1817, the following report of the township committee was read, adopted, and ordered to be entered upon the records:

"The committee who were appointed by the inhabitants of the township of North Brunswick at their annual meeting in April last, under an appropriation of \$10,000, to purchase a farm as a poor-house establishment, report that they have bought a farm on George's road of Jacob Klady, containing 139 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres for \$50 per acre, which will amount to \$6992, the payments to be made in the following manner, viz.: They have assumed a debt due to the estate of the late Robert Morris, Esq., on the first day of May, 1816, for \$2000, to be paid on the first of January, 1817; one-third on the first day of January, 1818, and the balance on the first of January, 1819. The committee further report that being largely within the appropriation made by a vote of the town, and desiring to carry into effect the wishes of the inhabitants fully expressed at the last annual town-meeting, they were obliged to erect a building, fences, and other improvements on the farm absolutely necessary before any number of paupers could there be accommodated and supported. The expenses of the above building and improvements will amount to \$1546.96, which will make the cost of the farm \$8538.96. The committee also report that in further prosecuting the plan adopted by the town they employed Henry Marshall on the 28th of April last, at \$225 per annum, to be the township farmer, and to take charge of all such persons as should be sent to the farm, and that as soon as the buildings were prepared all the regularly admitted paupers were taken to the poor-house. Mr. Marshall having resigned his charge, your committee have contracted with William Henderson to be the township farmer for the ensuing year for the sum of \$170. To enable your committee to comply with the contract above mentioned it will be necessary for the town to raise by tax or loan the sum of \$2140, due to the estate of the late Robert Morris, Esq., and the further sum of \$3444.40, to meet the first and second payments due to Mr. Klady.

It was resolved at the annual town-meeting in 1816:

"That the sum of $1200 be raised for the ensuing year for the support of the poor and the salary of the overseer of the farm," and ordered that the sum of $2000 be raised towards paying for the purchase of the farm, "and that $280 be raised towards discharging the interest due on the mortgage to Robert Morris."

The following extract from the report of the township committee in 1817 shows how satisfactory were the operations of the new place in comparison with the experience of the past:

"It also appears from the account of the overseer that about $800 have been expended for the support, clothing, and medical attendance of 21 paupers maintained at the poor-house farm during the last year. The town committee beg leave to draw the attention of the town to the sum expended for the support of the poor in the year 1816, previous to the present plan being adopted, and it will be found to have exceeded $3484, while their support under the present arrangement does not amount to more than $1290, calculating the interest on the purchase money of the farm at $490, and the amount expended in the last year at $800, making a difference in favor of the present plan of $1200, all which is respectfully submitted.

In 1819 it was ordered that $1897 be raised "for the last payment of Jacob Klady's bond for the poor-house farm," and that "$500 be raised for the support of the poor."

At the annual town-meeting in 1820 the following ordinance was passed:

"Be it ordained by the inhabitants of North Brunswick in town-meeting convened that the township committee for the time being with the overseer of the poor shall be and they are hereby constituted a board of directors, whose duty it shall be to employ some suitable person to work the poor-house farm. Said board shall also direct and advise the manner of cultivating and improving said farm, and from time to time form such rules and regulations for the internal government of the house as shall appear to them necessary and expedient."

In relation to the care of paupers in the township, the committee rendered the following report at the annual town-meeting of 1821:

"They report that your farm is in a progressive state of improvement, that there is between 40 and 50 acres of young, flourishing wood belonging to it which is carefully husbanded. This year the money you have allowed has been especially useful to secure every desirable object, and when you compare the amount raised for the poor with that formerly required you will have cause to be gratified at the vast diminution of expense. Your poor are well clad and abundantly supplied with good and wholesome food. There is as much comfort and content diffused among them as is reconcilable with a state of poverty, dependence, and their attendant ills, and your committee congratulate you upon the complete success of this system, which combines in its operation with the least possible call upon the property of individuals a perfect relief extended by society to its indigent members and a liberal fulfillment of the great law, that of benevolence and humanity.

It was ordered in 1823 that $60 be raised for painting the poor-house.

In 1836 it was ordered:

"That the township committee be authorized to erect a suitable building on the farm in some most convenient place for the accommodation of all or any insane person or persons which is now or may hereafter become a town charge to the amount of any sum not to exceed four hundred dollars."

The following statement of expenditures on account of the poor was rendered by the committee at the annual town-meeting in 1838, covering the time from March 1, 1837, to March 1, 1838:

"Henry Smith, for manure.....	$100.00
"Lewis Slover, services.....	150.00
"2 cows purchased, $42; 2 hogs do, $18.....	60.00
"Paid labor, $28.40; rails, $23.36.....	51.76
"Repairing building.....	19.83
"Seed rye, oats, and buckwheat, and grass-seed....	50.12
"Expenses of poor on the farm.....	988.55
"Expenses of poor off the farm.....	307.08

In the compilation of the above history of the inception and establishment of the township poor farm and poor-house of North Brunswick the records have been drawn upon liberally, for the twofold reason that they contain all that there is of interest connected with the early history of the institution, and that such a presentment of the facts embraces not alone the names of those prominent in the affairs of the township during the period 1802-38, but a contemporary record of the part taken by each, and of dates and measures and amounts which will be more and more interesting as the early days recede into the past. From time to time additions were made to the accommodations afforded by the institution. Its buildings increased in number, and the poor-house proper was rendered more comfortable and cheerful as the years went by. The poor-house is a two-story wood building, about 20 by 40 feet, with an addition about 15 by 23 feet, kept in good repair, and painted white. There are two good barns and other necessary outbuildings on the farm. In the settlement of the accounts of the townships of North Brunswick, East Brunswick, and New Brunswick, after the division of the township of North Brunswick, in 1860, the poor-house and farm, which had been established and maintained at the expense of the taxpayers of the whole township of North Brunswick as previously bounded, were allotted to New Brunswick, and have since been maintained at the expense and for the benefit of that city. The average number of inmates has been thirty-three for several years past. At present there are thirty, ranging from two to eighty-five years of age, about equally divided between the sexes. In 1881 the amount of money devoted by the city of New Brunswick to this institution was $6000. The steward, Mr. Alexander Gulick. The farm now ranks with the best in the township, consisting of one hundred and forty acres, one hundred and five of which are under cultivation. Since 1860 the township of North Brunswick has adopted the plan of having its paupers kept in private families.

The township records show that from 1820 to 1821, inclusive, the following sums were voted by the inhabitants of North Brunswick for all purposes connected with the care and sustenance of paupers within its limits, the figures having been copied from the minutes of the annual township meetings: 1820, $1870; 1821, $700; 1822, $700; 1823, $560; 1824, $800; 1825, $650; 1826, $800; 1827, $750; 1828, $700; 1829, $650; 1830, $700; 1831, $700; 1832, $1100; 1833, $1100; 1834, $1100; 1835, $1300; 1836, $1500; 1837, $1500; 1838, $1500; 1839, $1500; 1840, $1000; 1841, $800; 1842, $900; 1843, $1000;¹ 1844, $1200;¹ 1845, $1200;¹ 1846, $1200;¹ 1847, $1000;¹ 1848, $1000;¹ 1849, $1200;¹ 1850, $1500; 1851, $1500; 1852, $1500; 1853, $1500;¹ 1854, $1500;¹ 1855, $2000; 1856, $2500; 1857, $2500;¹ 1858, $3000;¹ 1859, $5000;¹ 1860, $300; 1861, $100;² 1862, the money in the hands of the collector; 1863, $300;³ 1864, $375; 1865, $450; 1866, $600; 1867, $600; 1868, $600; 1869, $800; 1870, $800; 1871, $600; 1872, $700; 1873, $700; 1874, $700; 1875, $700; 1876, $700; 1877, $850; 1878, $800; 1879, $1000; 1880, $1000; 1881, $1000.

Educational.—The early school-houses in the township were built by subscription, and teachers were hired by those who were well enough off to bear the expense, much as select schools of a late date have been supported. The first entry to be found in the township records relative to the provision of means of education to those too poor to pay for it in North Brunswick was made in 1827, and reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the sum of five hundred dollars be raised for the education of poor children in this township."

This resolution was passed that year at the annual town-meeting. In 1828 three hundred dollars was likewise appropriated, and the same amount was voted in 1829. That year the first school committee was elected, consisting of Staats Van Deursen, Lewis D. Hardenbergh, Peter Dayton, James Gable, and Isaac Brower. In 1830 it was ordered "That the balance of two hundred and fifty dollars in the hands of the collector, belonging to the fund for educating poor children, be transferred to the school committee."

There seems to have been no other provision made for public schools in the township than the annual election of a school committee until 1833, when it was ordered:

"That the balance of $600 in the hands of the collector of school fund be divided among all the schools organized by the 1st Monday of April next.

"That the town committee pay the expenses of publishing the school act for last year, $6, and also for the present year the same sum for the like publication."

In 1834 it was ordered:

"That the school fund now in hand be distributed in due proportion to such schools as the trustees thereof have or may report on or before the first of May next ensuing."

Similar provision for public school was several times made at the annual town-meetings during the ensuing five years. The following report was rendered by the school committee in 1840:

"The school committee of the township of North Brunswick report that the whole number of children between the ages of five and sixteen years, as reported by the trustees of the several districts in said township to your committee, is 1535, viz.: From District No. 1, 930; No. 2, 28; No. 3, 44; No. 4, 16; No. 5, 74; No. 6, 87; No. 7, 12; No. 8, 26; No. 9, 72; No. 10, 59; No. 11, 148; No. 12, 39.

"And they further report that the apportionment of public school money to this township is $411.39, giving to each scholar 26 cents, amounting to $399.10, leaving a balance in the hands of the collector of $12.29 to meet expenses."

Below are the statistics of the schools of the township, 1841—45:

Year.	No. of Districts.	No. of children between the ages of 5 and 16.	No. of scholars taught.	Amount received from collector.	School-houses built.

In 1841 the tuition ranged from $1.50 to $5 in District No. 1; it was $2 in Districts Nos. 3 to 11, and $2.50 in District No. 12. School was kept open all the year in Districts Nos. 1, 3, 5 to 8, and 11 and 12; three quarters in District No. 10; and two quarters in Districts Nos. 4 and 9. The money received from the collector was apportioned to parents in all the districts, and by them used in paying tuitions. In 1842 the tuition was $2 to $5 in District No. 1; $2 in Districts Nos. 2 to 11, and $3 in District No. 12. Schools were kept four quarters in Districts Nos. 1, 3, 4, and 6 to 12, and two quarters in Districts Nos. 2 and 5. The money was paid directly to the teachers. In 1844 the tuition was $2 to $3 in District No. 1; $2 in Districts Nos. 5, 6, 9, and 11, and part Districts Nos. 3, 4, and 7, and $2.50 in District No. 12, and part District No. 2. School was kept open twelve months in Dis-

Schools were kept a year in District No. 1, and part Districts Nos. 2, 3, 4, 7, and 10; nine months in District No. 9, and half a year in District No. 5.

The only time the names of the school trustees were entered in the record was in 1843, when the following named were serving: Peter P. Runyan, George G. Nevins, J. Whitnach, John Christopher, Richard DeMott, J. H. Outcalt, H. Cock, Benjamin L. Smith, H. H. Booraem, J. Van Deventer, Peter L. Buckalew, Matthew Gilland, J. Combs, Abraham Rappleveya, R. D. Applegate, F. Stutts, Stephen Smith, J. L. Piereson, and Cornelius W. Tunison.

School committeemen were not elected after 1846. In 1847 Dr. Henry B. Poal was elected the first township superintendent of schools. The annual reports upon the condition of the schools of the township were not thereafter entered in the records till 1851.

"The report of the superintendent of schools was received, showing the whole number of districts to be 12; whole number of children taught, 1055; amount of money raised and expended, $653.91; whole number of children between the ages of 5 and 16 in the district (township), 2440."

The "free school" system was adopted in 1851. The report of the superintendent for that year, rendered at the annual town-meeting of 1852, showed the following comparison between the years 1850 and 1851:

"Schools upon the old system, in which the bills of tuition averaged $3 per quarter, were open for eleven months in 1850.

"Free schools were open ten and one-fourth months in 1851.

"The whole number of children taught was 1055 in 1850.

"The whole number of children taught was 1351 in 1851.

"The average number of children attending school in the several districts was as follows:

This surely must be regarded as a triumph for the free school system.

Statistics of schools, 1852: Number of districts, 12; number of children of the school age, 2785; number of children taught, 1765; average number of months schools were kept, 10½; amount of school money raised by tax, $7803; amount received from the State, $1463.23; number of teachers (11 male, 7 female), 18; total amount appropriated for school purposes, $9366.23.

School statistics of 1857: Number of districts, 12; number of children of the school age, 3403; number who attended school, 2217; average number of months schools were kept open, 10½; amount of money raised by tax for the support of schools, $10,209.

This showing, together with all previous statistical statements, included the schools in the city of New Brunswick and those in the then portions of North Brunswick now embraced within the limits of the township of East Brunswick. It is probable that the advanced thought and educational experience of members of the successive committees resident at New Brunswick—the cradle of learning in Middlesex County and a wide range of country in all directions beyond—had their influence in emancipating the schools of North Brunswick from the primitive condition of contemporary country schools in New Jersey at an earlier period than that at which improvements would otherwise have occurred. With the separation of New Brunswick from the township in 1860 came a marked change in the organization of school affairs in North Brunswick; but the seed that had been sown by the early and long alliance, and the community of interests educationally that had existed between the two sections of the old township as a whole, has borne good fruit since the division, and at this time the opportunities for the acquirement of a common-school education are as good in North Brunswick as in any town of similar status in New Jersey.

The number of children between the ages of five and eighteen in North Brunswick during the period from 1867 to 1880 is shown below: 1867, 335; 1868, 319; 1869, 354; 1870, 381; 1871, 400; 1872, 312; 1873, 302; 1874, 326; 1875, 350; 1876, 344; 1877, 352; 1878, 364; 1879, 347; 1880, 360.

There are in the township three school districts, numbered in the enumeration of the school districts of Middlesex County 27, 28, and 29, and known respectively as "Oak Hill," "Miltown," and "Red Lion" districts. Their statistics in 1880 were as follows:

Amount of apportionment from State appropriation: No. 27, $300; No. 28, $565.08; No. 29, $300. Amount of district school-tax voted for payment of teachers' salaries: No. 28, $400. Amount of district school-tax voted to be used for building, purchasing, hiring, repairing, or furnishing public school-houses: No. 28, $100; No. 29, $75. Total amount of district school-tax ordered to be raised: No. 28, $500; No. 29, $75. Total amount received from all sources for public school purposes: No. 27, $300; No. 28, $1065.08; No. 29, $375. Present value of school property: No. 27, $1500; No. 28, $3500; No. 29, $800. Number of children of the school age in the districts: No. 27, 90; No. 28, 199; No. 29, 71. Average number of months schools have been kept open: No. 27, 9½; No. 28, 10; No. 29, 10. Average attendance: No. 27, 22; No. 28, 76; No. 29, 24. Estimated number of children in the districts attending private schools: No. 27, 15; No. 28, 6; No. 29, 2. Estimated number of children in the districts who attended no schools during the year: No. 27, 33; No. 28, 48; No. 29, 9. Seating capacity of school-houses and condition of same: No. 27, 50, good; No. 28, 150, very good; No. 29, 60, good. Number of male teachers employed: No. 27, 1; No. 28, 1. Number of female teachers employed: No. 27, 1; No. 28, 1; No. 29, 1. Average salary per month paid male teachers: No. 28, $45. Average monthly salary of female teachers: No. 27, $31; No. 28, $30; No. 29, $25.

Industrial Pursuits.—A grist-mill was built where Milltown now is, on the North Brunswick side of Lawrence's Brook, at a very early day. Soon after the beginning of the present century it was owned by Jacob I. Bergen, and called Bergen's Mill. Its previous history the writer has been unable to trace. The water-power at Brookford was first made use of as long ago as 1750, when it turned the machinery of a grist-mill which stood within the area now occupied by Parsons' Brookford Snuff-Mills. Early in the present century a saw-mill was in operation there under the same roof with the grist-mill, and the concern was owned or operated, or both, by Isaac Petty, who after a number of years sold out to Matthew Edgerton.

A fulling-mill was introduced, and when machinery put an end to the domestic carding of wool and the periodical bringing of it to a mill to be made into cloth for private families, the works were converted into a snuff-mill, and as such were operated by Mr. Edgerton from 1839 to 1856.

In 1851 the establishment was destroyed by fire, and whatever remained of the old grist-mill and saw-mill disappeared forever. The snuff-mill was rebuilt in 1852, and the manufacture of snuff was carried on with considerable success by Mr. Edgerton until he disposed of the property to Mr. William G. Parsons in 1856.

Such, in brief, is the history of manufacturing enterprise at this locality, which from about the time of any general settlement in the surrounding country has been a scene of industry and business activity second to no other in the country south of the Raritan either in importance or celebrity.

THE BROOKFORD SNUFF-MILLS.—These mills, the property of Mr. William G. Parsons, he purchased of Matthew S. Edgerton in 1856, and has improved them from time to time, erecting the large brick building, now so conspicuous, in 1872. He is engaged in the manufacture of four varieties of snuff, known to the trade as "Scotch," "Maccaboy," "Lundyfoot," and the "French Rappee" snuffs. His purchases of tobacco are large each year, and it comes mainly from Richmond, Va., though some is bought from Missouri, Kentucky, and in the New York market. Little or no Connecticut, Delaware, or New Jersey tobacco is used, that grown in these States being too light for use in this factory. Of the four varieties mentioned, the Brookford mills make many times as much "Scotch" as of all the remaining three kinds. The quality of the snuffs manufactured here is as good and the price they bring as high as those of any snuffs in the market. Mr. Parsons sells in large quantities, and to a considerable extent supplies the New York jobbers. But it is to the South that snuff is sent in the largest quantities, and there it is in most general use, and there it is that Parsons' yellow "Scotch" snuff is in the greatest demand and has the best reputation.

The Brookford mills are situated on the bank of Lawrence's Brook, the old-time water-power previously referred to supplying the motive-power, about three-quarters of a mile from Milltown. In the management of the concern Mr. Parsons is assisted by his sons, James M. Parsons and William G. Parsons, Jr.

THE MEYER RUBBER COMPANY.—The cradle of rubber shoe manufacture is undoubtedly at Milltown. It was there that Christopher Meyer, who had begun his investigations soon after Goodyear and Day, made his first essay at manufacturing, and there, obtaining his right under the Goodyear patent and fighting the battles with Day under the Goodyear banner, he went on inventing and improving machinery and perfecting the process of rubber shoe making. To-day no man more thoroughly understands all the branches and details of the rubber trade than Mr. Meyer. He is the leading spirit of three companies, all having manufacturing in the county,—the Meyer Works at Milltown, and the New Jersey Works and the Novelty Hard Rubber Works at New Brunswick,—and all occupying important places in the rubber trade.

In 1839, Mr. Meyer went to New Brunswick from Newark to put up for Horace H. Day the first steam-engine and machinery Day ever owned for the first rubber-works ever put in operation there. Day was then making carriage-cloths and rubber shoes, but the former was so odorous as to be intolerable, and so soft that when the carriage-top was put down the folds of the cloth stuck together and peeled off, and the latter in summer were similarly unfit for use, while in winter they became hard as bricks. Mr. Meyer devised a plan by which the unpleasant smell was almost entirely obviated and the cloth and shoes rendered more durable. Mr. Day refused to recognize the value of this process, and Mr. Meyer thereupon decided to leave his employ, even insisting upon doing so after Day had reconsidered his refusal.

In 1840, Mr. Meyer began business on his own account near the Landing Bridge in New Brunswick, and remained there three months. Messrs. Hutchinson and Onderdonk had meanwhile dissolved partnership in a rubber business they had been carrying on in Water Street, New Brunswick, and the latter started the rubber manufacture in James Neilson's old saw-mill, the former going to Newark. Failing in his experiment, Mr. Onderdonk sold out to Mr. Meyer, who ran the works with his own machinery two years so successfully that Mr. Onderdonk in turn bought him out, and, in company with Mr. Johnson Letson, established the works now of the New Brunswick Rubber Company.

At this juncture Mr. J. C. Ackerman proposed to Mr. Meyer to build for him a factory on the site of the old Milltown grist-mill, and this was done, Mr. James Bishop joining with Mr. Meyer in the management. This was in 1843. In 1844 the works were started and engaged in the manufacture of shirred goods, carriage-cloth, and rubber shoes with leather bottoms, the latter being soon substituted by the Goodyear all-rubber shoe, for though Goodyear had a patent on the process, it was not respected and soon became common property. Before the process of vulcanization was understood the rubber had to be dissolved in turpentine and acids. The caoutchouc was received from Para in three forms,—in sheets, in bottles, and in rough shoes formed by dipping clay moulds in the sap. All these were utilized by Mr. Meyer. The rough shoes were fur-tipped and prepared for sale; the gum bottles were dissolved and spread over cloth for carriage-cloth; the imported sheets were cut into fore-uppers and joined with cloth quarters to cover leather soles for shoes. In this manner the works turned out about one thousand pairs of shoes per week. These shoes, however, were found to get hard in winter and sticky in summer, and were soon condemned by popular disfavor, and the business received a serious check. The works also turned out rubber ponton-bridges and boats for government use in the Mexican war. In 1845 the factory was burned down, with Mr. Meyer's residence, leaving him absolutely without a cent of capital and without stock or machinery. Mr. John R. Ford then came in and furnished capital to start the works anew, and under the name of Ford & Co. they continued in operation for several years. The new buildings measured twenty-five by one hundred and thirty and thirty by forty feet, and in them the business steadily grew and improvements were made until in 1851 a second fire visited the establishment. In 1852 a stock company was formed, named the Ford Rubber Company, and all of the present buildings except the new brick building were occupied. In 1855 the name of the company was changed to the Meyer Rubber Company, and so it still remains. The company is now working with $200,000 capital stock, and is officered as follows: President, Christopher Meyer; Treasurer, John R. Ford; Superintendent, John C. Evans. Mr. James C. Edmonds very efficiently filled the office of secretary from 1846 until his death, Dec. 6, 1879. For a long time Mr. John Evans, father of the present superintendent, was in charge of the factory, and his close attention to all the details of manufacture, of which he had an admirable knowledge, conduced much to the success of the enterprise. The present superintendent has a practical knowledge of the business, gained by years of experience, which fitted him to fill the responsible position made vacant by his father's death.

The buildings occupied for manufacturing purposes by the Meyer Rubber Company are eight in number, the larger ones so separated that some of them might be saved in case of fire, and the smaller ones attached to them. A large frame building, measuring fifty by one hundred and twelve feet, four stories high, with a wing extending from it about thirty feet, contains machinery for steaming, crushing, and washing crude rubber, obtained in immense quantities from Para, Nicaragua, Esmeralda, and other places in Central and South America, store-rooms, the "stripping"-room, a last-room, a varnishing-room, a large room occupied as a stock-room and for the manufacture of "Arctic" overshoes, and a room in which rubber boots are made. Attached to one end of this building is a steam heater in a building forty by fifty-eight feet, to which is attached a boiler-house containing apparatus for supplying steam to the heater, and attached to this building also are two round dry heaters. In the wing are located the offices of the company.

In 1878 a brick building (now the main building) was erected. It measured fifty by one hundred and fifty feet, is four stories high, and contains on the ground floor machinery for preparing rubber for manufacture into boots and overshoes, while on the three floors above are carried on the various processes of cutting and manufacturing until the boots and shoes are turned out complete. Attached are an engine-house, twenty-two by fifty feet, containing an engine of five hundred horse-power; a boiler-house, thirty by forty feet, containing three boilers; and a building, thirty by sixty feet, in which are compounded from divers ingredients the various colors given to rubber for use in these works. The other buildings are a three-story brick store-house, sixty by seventy-five feet, where are stored both the crude material as received at the factory and the products of the same awaiting shipment, and a frame three-story building, forty by sixty feet, on the opposite side of Lawrence's Brook, in which are manufactured the boxes in which goods are packed for shipment. The two principal buildings are connected by an elevated gangway over the street, and the box-factory is connected with the large wooden building by a narrow and slender bridge, which spans the brook. Besides these factory buildings the company owns a farm of about one hundred acres, upon which is raised produce to supply the stock, consisting of a dozen or more horses.

From 350 to 400 hands are employed by the Meyer Rubber Company, mostly German, and about equally divided between the sexes. Over 7000 pairs of sandals, boots, shoes, "Arctics," etc., per day, or between 1,400,000 and 1,800,000 per year, at a value of $1,000,000, are turned out. Most of the shoes are made for city wear, light and stylish, and the works often introduce new and attractive styles. It is at this factory that most of the important improvements in machinery for rubber manufacture have been invented and perfected. For example, the sole of a rubber shoe was formerly made in three parts, because three different thicknesses were required for the sole, the shank, and the heel. Here a machine was invented which converted a sheet of rubber at once into shoe-soles of three thicknesses in one piece, all ready for the uppers. The machinery for making the present style of sandal was prepared here; also the patented engraved steel roll, by which a permanent impression is made upon the upper to resemble the ridge-effect obtained in other factories by laying rubber cords on top of the fore upper, which by saving the manufacture, the cutting it, and the laying it on by hand, cheapens the cost over a cent and a half per pair, and saves eight thousand dollars or ten thousand dollars a year to such companies as have secured the right to use it. The new process of mixture for the manufacture of shoes, including the use of resin and tar, was also devised here by Mr. Meyer, and is next in real importance, in the estimation of practical manufacturers, to the invention of vulcanization itself, but was never patented on account of the difficulty of sustaining patents at the time against infringements. It was kept a secret for a while, but has now become common property. Altogether, the Meyer Rubber-Works are interesting, both on account of their extensive business, and as being the birth-place of most of the improved machinery for making rubber shoes, and of all the new styles of shoes which the market brings out. As a local industry they take rank with the first in the State, and Milltown and the surrounding country are better off for their presence and that of the substantial workmen to whom they afford well-paid employment.

THE VOORHEES STATION TANNERY.—In Franklin, Somerset County, is a stopping-place on the Branch Railway to Millstone, known as Voorhees Station. The depot is just west of the Princeton and New Brunswick turnpike, across which highway, within the borders of North Brunswick, is located a tannery, which was first put in operation at a date so remote that it cannot be more definitely stated than as during the latter part of the eighteenth century. In 1806 it was the property of Daniel King, and at that time was by no means a new structure. In 1826 it was destroyed by fire.

The present building was soon erected on the old site by Mr. King, who was the proprietor until his death, about two years later. The property was then sold to James Moran, who disposed of it to John Christopher in 1836, when he could not have been the proprietor more than a few months. Mr. Christopher carried on quite an extensive business there until his death in 1850, when the premises passed into the possession of his son, Jacob V. D. Christopher, the present owner. The tannery contains twenty-eight vats. A fifteen horse-power engine is used, and four men are employed. Harness, shoe, and upper leather is manufactured.

OTHER INDUSTRIES.—Considerable nursery stock is raised in the township, and in various localities are a convenient number of wheelwrights', blacksmiths', shoemakers', and other small mechanics' shops.

Church History.—THE GEORGE'S ROAD BAPTIST CHURCH.—The field occupied by the George's Road Church was missionary ground of the New Jersey Baptist State Convention. Before any church organization was formed Rev. John B. Case labored there as a missionary of the Convention. Brethren also from the New Brunswick Baptist Church—G. S. Webb, Randolph Martin, and Robert Lyle—used to visit the place and hold preaching services, prayer-meetings, and Sabbath-school sessions. Those who were baptized as the fruit of these labors were received into the fellowship of the New Brunswick Church. After a while measures were taken to constitute the present church. This movement seemed to be a proper one, as the distance from New Brunswick was five miles, and to some of the members it was twice that distance; and besides this, the road was a hard one to travel. Nevertheless there were sisters who used to walk there to attend Mr. Webb's ministry.

At a meeting held at John T. Bennett's on the 20th of January, 1843, articles of faith, church covenant, and the name of the church were agreed upon. On the 23d of January, 1843, a Council met, consisting of the following Baptist Churches: First New Brunswick, Independent Bethel at Washington, Hightstown, Penn's Neck, Nottingham Square, Piscataway, and Jacksonville. Everything being satisfactory to the Council, the new organization was recognized with appropriate exercises as a regularly constituted Baptist Church.

The number of members thus organized were 33, whose names are as follows:

Rev. John B. Case and his wife, Mary B. Case, from the Independent Bethel Church at Washington; Mary Steward, from the Abyssinia Church, New York City; and the following thirty members dismissed from the New Brunswick Church: David Provost, William Suydam, Elizabeth Creamer, Ann Meseroll, Thomas W. Bastedo, William W. Dehart, Jane Eliza Buckelew, Phebe Drake, William Bound, Peter Z. Buckelew, Jane Suydam, Mary Thompson, Elizabeth Sperling, Margaret Ann Bennett, Eliza Dehart, Frederick W. Buckelew, Maria Ann Bennet, William Major, Ida Buckelew, David Creamer, Phebe M. Thompson, Louis Sperling, Elizabeth Meseroll, Leah Dehart, Fanny Buckelew, Mary Buckelew, Catherine Major, and Sara Hendricks.

Its first pastor was Rev. John B. Case, who re-maintained a little over two years. At this time the church had no meeting-house, but held meetings at private houses and at the school-house. In March, 1845, Rev. Mr. Case resigned, and an invitation was given to Rev. David P. Perdun to become the pastor, which he accepted, commencing his pastorate in April, 1845. In this year the church began to build a house of worship, which was dedicated on the 17th of March, 1847. Rev. Mr. Hopkins, from New York City, preached the dedication sermon from Haggai ii. 7: "And I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come: and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts."

Mr. Perdun was noted for revival effort, and quite a number were brought into the church through his protracted meetings. In his last will he left a legacy of $300 to the church, which it found to be very useful. In December, 1847, Rev. Mr. Perdun resigned his charge of the church, after which the pulpit was supplied for a few months by Rev. Mr. Gesner. The next pastor was Rev. B. Stelle, who came as a supply, and later assumed the pastorate, remaining until the close of 1853. In October, 1854, Rev. Morgan Cox came, and remained until April, 1860, after which the pulpit was supplied for a time by Rev. Mr. Nightingale. In 1862, Rev. Charles Cordo was called to the pastorate, and was in charge until June, 1863. After this few meetings were held during the succeeding two years, the church having neither supplies nor pastor. In March, 1865, Rev. Christian Brinckerhoff was called, and was pastor until 1868, and remained somewhat longer as supply. Rev. Mr. Brinckerhoff was a builder of churches both spiritual and substantial. During his pastorate the house underwent a very general alteration, which much improved it in appearance internally and externally. During the winter of 1868 and 1869, Rev. "Father" Webb acted as a supply, when an interesting state of religious feeling was manifested. In the early part of the latter year Rev. Louis Silleck became pastor, remaining until February, 1874, and the parsonage was built during his pastorate. Rev. Messrs. Davis and Babbage acted as supplies for a few months, and in 1875 the latter accepted a call to the pastorate, the duties of which he still continues to discharge.

From the organization of this church to 1880 there were added to it by baptism, 144; by letter, 32. The decrease was as follows: Dismissed, 67; deceased, 33; excluded, 60. The membership at this time is about 60.

The first officers of the church were the following:

The present officers are William Major, Ross Drake, and Isaac Messeroll, trustees; William Major and Ross Drake, deacons; Edwin B. Drake, clerk; David Pearce, treasurer.

The Sunday-school connected with the George's Road Church has four officers, nine teachers, and seventy-three scholars. The average attendance is forty-five. The library numbers one hundred volumes, and the superintendent is Mr. E. B. Drake.

THE MILLTOWN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—In 1844 a Methodist class was formed at Milltown by Rev. Ralph Stout, a local preacher and a member of the Liberty Street Methodist Episcopal Church of New Brunswick, the meeting-place being in an old school-house opposite the site of the present parsonage, and was attached to the Liberty Street Church. In the spring of 1846 this class and the organizations at Washington, Old Bridge, and Fresh Pond were formed into a circuit, known as the Middlesex Circuit. Three years later the Milltown charge was separated from the Middlesex Circuit, and again attached to the Liberty Street Church, and in the spring of 1851 it was separated from the New Brunswick charge for the second time, and since that date has been an independent church.

The constituent members of the Milltown Methodist Episcopal Church were nineteen in number, named as follows: Christopher Meyer, Margaret Meyer, James C. Edmonds, Mary E. Edmonds, Ella Evans, Evans Edmonds, David Evans, Mary A. Van Arsdale, John Evans, Elizabeth Howard, Lewis S. Hyatt, Hannah A. Hyatt, John M. Thompson, Charles C. Hyatt, Catharine Atcherson, Elizabeth Titatus, Susan Stephens, and — Brown.

A meeting was called by the society, Feb. 19, 1851, at which arrangements were made for the erection of a house of worship, and John R. Ford, Christopher Meyer, John Evans, James C. Edmonds, Isaac G. Van Arsdale, Lewis S. Hyatt, and Charles C. Hyatt were elected trustees. The board of trustees organized with Christopher Meyer as president, Isaac G. Van Arsdale as treasurer, and James C. Edmonds as secretary. The trustees started a subscription with pledges of eleven hundred dollars. John R. Ford donated a lot, upon which a church was built by Edward B. Wright, contractor, at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars, and dedicated Dec. 25, 1852; the bell, which cost one hundred and twenty-two dollars, being donated by Mrs. John R. Ford. A wing was attached to the main body of this church, which was occupied as a chapel.

The church above described was torn down, and the chapel sold and removed, and the present brick church was erected on the old site in 1872, at a cost of fourteen thousand dollars, and was dedicated by Bishop Simpson, of Philadelphia. It is located on Main Street, nearly in the centre of that part of the village northwest of Lawrence's Brook.

The following-named preachers have served the class and church in Middletown in the order named: Revs. Ralph Stout, 1844-46; James Ayers, 1846-47; James Jaquette, 1847-49; James Hilliard, 1849-52; James Freeman, D.D., 1852-54; I. D. King, 1854-56; Joseph Horner, 1856-57; A. Owen, 1857-58; H. P. Staats, 1858-60; T. D. Hanlon, 1860-61; S. E. Post, 1861-63; Jesse Styles, 1863-65; William Franklin, 1865-67; A. Lawrence, 1867-71; G. Reed, 1871-73; T. C. Carman, 1873-74; C. F. Garrison, 1874-77; S. C. Chatlin, 1877-79; L. M. Atkinson, 1879-81.

In 1858 the trustees purchased the present parsonage, at a cost of seven hundred and fifty dollars. It is a comfortable two-story frame dwelling, situated on Main Street, near the church.

The Sunday-school was organized in 1851. James C. Edmonds was the first superintendent. At his death, in December, 1879, he was succeeded by E. J. Carhart, having served continuously twenty-eight years. The membership of the Sunday-school in 1881 was one hundred and sixty-five. The library contained about one hundred and fifty volumes.

THE LIVINGSTON PARK CHAPEL.—This is a small frame building, occupied by any or all of the denominations of Christians represented at and in the vicinity of Franklin Park. It was erected in 1875 and 1876 on land donated by the late Henry K. How, and dedicated in June of the latter year by Rev. Henry F. Smith, pastor of the First Baptist Church of New Brunswick, just one year to a day from the death of the generous donor of the site, religious services having previously been held in the house.

On the first Sunday in each month in 1881, Rev. Henry F. Smith or Rev. Mr. Marsh holds a service in the chapel. On the remaining Sundays in each month services are conducted by theological students from Rutgers College.

Soon after the completion of the chapel a Sunday-school was organized, with William M. Van Sickle as superintendent. The present superintendent is Eugene Carrigan. The school numbers thirty-five scholars, and has a small library.

Burial-Places.—There can be little doubt that the earliest interments within the present township were made at the old graveyard now included in Van Liew Cemetery, and at the ancient burying-ground at Three-Mile Run. Which of the two places has any claim to priority would be a difficult question to answer. In both grounds are graves with monuments on which the inscriptions have been rendered undecipherable by the hand of Time, and in both are doubtless many graves unmarked and unrecognizable as such. The earliest legible inscription to be seen in the old portion of Van Liew Cemetery is in the German language, and is to the following effect:

"Johannes Martinus Van Harlingen was born January 11th, 1684, at Westbroek, in Holland, and died October 22nd, 1768, at Lawrence's Brook."

Near by are other time-worn monuments, bearing the following inscriptions:

"In Memory of Maria Van Harlinge, Relict of J. M. Van Harlingen, born March 10th, 1700, and died October 8th, 1788."

"Richard Jaques departed this life May 9th, 1792."

"In memory of Eva Van Harlingen, who departed this life October the 6th, 1799, age 64 years, 9 months, and 12 days.

"Holland was her nation,
New Jersey was her dwelling place,
And Christ is her salvation."

The following-named persons were interred in this burying-ground previous to 1825, as appears by the dates on the headstones erected at their graves:

Johannah, wife of Garret Voorhees, Oct. 22, 1799; Samuel, son of John and Hannah Outcalt, June 11, 1800; John G. Voorhees, Sept. 7, 1800; Caty, wife of Jacob Musero,¹ Sept. 8, 1800; Cornelius Van Derbilt, Sept. 26, 1800; Hannah, wife of Peter Buckerlew,² Feb. 28, 1803; Frederick, son of Jeremiah and Margaret Voorhees, Aug. 31, 1804; Catharine, daughter of Jeremiah and Margaret Voorhees, Sept. 12, 1804; Sarah, daughter of John M. and Frances Bloom, Jan. 12, 1807; Cornelius Vanderbilt, son of Cornelius and Jane Bodine, March 31, 1807; Johannah Vanderbilt, April 17, 1807; Nicholas Bordine, Jr.,³ May 21, 1807; Catharine, daughter of Nicholas and Eliza Van Brunt, Feb. 23, 1808; Jacob Meserole,¹ Dec. 12, 1809; Jacques Van Liew, Aug. 28, 1810; Peter Buckerlew,² Dec. 28, 1810; Mrs. Johannah Voorhees, Jan. 9, 1811; Ruth, widow of William Budd, March 30, 1814; Dinah Bordine,³ wife of Powl DeHart, Jan. 31, 1815; Nicholas Bordine,³ March 16, 1814; Cornelia Ann, daughter of Cornelius and Jane Bodine, May 1, 1815; Jane, wife of Cornelius Bordine, May 14, 1815; George, son of Nicholas and Elizabeth Van Brunt, May 12, 1815; Frederick Outcalt, Jr., Aug. 26, 1818; Elijah Hunt, Dec. 3, 1818; John Ryder, Jan. 2, 1823, aged eighty-one years and ten days; Peter Voorhees, Oct. 10, 1823; Elizabeth Stephenson, wife of Peter Voorhees, Jan. 11, 1824; Bernardus Ryder, Feb. 3, 1824, aged seventy-five; Maria Voorhees, wife of Jaques Van Liew, Oct. 1, 1824; John Vanderbilt, Nov. 18, 1824.

The old graveyard at Three-Mile Run had no connection with the early church at that spot, as it was not used as a place of burial until some years after the church was removed. Rev. Johannes Leydt, second pastor of the First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick, died June 2, 1783, and he was buried there. His tombstone stands directly in front of the gate, with an inscription stating the day of his death and age. His wife, Treuntje Sleight, died Dec. 2, 1763, and is buried by his side. Two other stones mark graves of his children,—Elizabeth, who died Oct. 22, 1760, aged twelve, and Anna, who died June 10, that year, aged seven months.

Johannes Van Liew, Oct. 10, 1794; Mary, wife of John Hampton, Aug. 28, 1796; Gertrude, wife of Cornelius Cornell, March 19, 1805; Henry Cortel-yon, Feb. 22, 1806; Dorothy Lott, wife of Johannes Van Liew, Oct. 9, 1813; Cornelius Cornell, March

There is a burial-place on the Princeton and Brunswick turnpike, in the southwestern part of the township. In the vicinity of the George's Road Baptist Church is another. Neither of these possesses sufficient antiquity to render it interesting historically.

The burying-place of St. Peter's Catholic Church of New Brunswick is located on the Princeton and Brunswick turnpike, about a mile from the city line, and in the northwestern corner of North Brunswick township. It has an area of about seven acres, and is laid out in lots. The earliest grave that can be found there is that of Bridget Win, who died Jan. 14, 1865. This cemetery contains several beautiful monuments, those of the O'Neal, the Lyons, the Dixon, and the McGahill families being conspicuous. This cemetery is in charge of a committee constituted as follows: Rev. Father O'Grady, Martin Kelley, John McCloskey, and John Lawrence.

THE VAN LIEW CEMETERY.—The Van Liew Cemetery Association was incorporated in 1861. The first officers were Dennis Vanderbilt, president; Henry H. Booraem, treasurer; and Philip Kuhlthian, secretary; Directors, Dennis Vanderbilt, Ross Drake, Philip Kuhlthian, Henry H. Booraem, and Peter Stevenson. Van Liew Cemetery embraces about five acres, including the old cemetery, in which were buried many members of the Van Harlingen, Voorhees, Vanderbilt, Van Liew, Bodine, Buckalew, Messeroll, and other old families of North Brunswick, and which has been referred to. It is beautifully laid out, and is rendered attractive by several fine monuments.

ELMWOOD CEMETERY.—This cemetery is situated on George's road, near the northern border of the township, not far distant from Van Liew Cemetery, and contains about forty acres. It is the property of the Elmwood Cemetery Association of New Brunswick. This association nominally succeeded the Cedar Lawn Cemetery Association of New Brunswick, which was incorporated by an act of the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, approved March 18, 1868, of which the following is the first section:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That Lucius P. Porter, John W. Newell, Henry R. Baldwin, M.D., Levi D. Jarrard, Henry L. Janeway, Johnson Letson, A. D. Newell, M.D., Simon Van Winkle, and such other persons as are now or shall hereafter become stockholders, their successors or assigns, be and are hereby made and constituted a corporation and body politic by the name of the Cedar Lawn Cemetery Association of the City of New Brunswick."

A supplement to this act was passed and approved March 26, 1873, of which the subjoined is a copy:

"1. Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That the name of the 'Cedar Lawn Cemetery Association of the City of New Brunswick' be changed to the 'Elmwood Cemetery Association of the City of New Brunswick,' and by such name shall be invested with all the powers, rights, and duties which belonged to said Cedar Lawn Cemetery."

"2. And be it enacted, That the first section of the act to which this is a supplement is hereby amended by striking out the names of the corporators individually named therein and inserting in lieu thereof as such individual corporators the following persons, viz.: Henry H. Booraem, Daniel G. Stubblebine, Garret Van Liew Booraem, Levi D. Jarrard, Henry Arbogast, Cornelius Farley, and Davis Carel."

"3. And be it enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be and the same are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect immediately."

"Elmwood" is one of the largest and most beautiful burial-places in this section, and is marked by a number of elegant and costly monuments. The officers of the association are as follows: Daniel G. Stubblebine, president and superintendent; Cornelius Farley, secretary; and Davis Carel, treasurer; Directors, D. G. Stubblebine, William G. Parsons, Davis Carel, L. D. Jarrard, John C. Meyer, Van Liew Booraem, and Henry Arbogast.

Villages and Hamlets.—MILLTOWN is the only village lying wholly or partially within the township of North Brunswick. It is located on Lawrence's Brook, mostly in North Brunswick, but partly in East Brunswick, and is a small but thrifty and home-like place, owing its existence to the presence there of the extensive factory of the Meyer Rubber Company, which affords employment to nearly the entire adult and a good share of the juvenile population. It has an aspect of comfort and solidity which is to be seen only in villages in which a majority of the heads of families own their own houses, the policy towards its employes of the Meyer Rubber Company (which pays cash for labor and has no store) being to extend an opportunity to such as so desire to purchase on easy terms and own a house in the village, thus insuring the permanent service of desirable artisans, and diffusing a spirit of thrift and contentment among its workmen, which redounds to the benefit of the company eventually by going far to prevent disaffection through the absence of the abject subservience of labor to capital, which is the fruitful source of that rancor and antagonism which engender strikes, and result only too often in the stagnation or utter prostration of manufacturing industry.

The history of this village is brief. Its nucleus was the old grist-mill known early in the present century as Bergen's Mill, in honor of its then proprietor, Jacob I. Bergen, the locality being known at that time and later as Bergen Mills. This mill changed ownership several times, and finally, in 1843, the last vestige of it disappeared with the utilization of the water-power by Mr. J. C. Meyer for the manufacture of rubber goods. The beginning of the new enterprise was insignificant when compared with its present extent, but it made the beginning of the growth of the settlement called Bergen's Mills to the later flourishing village of Milltown.

In 1816 the place consisted of the old grist-mill, a little tavern, and five or six houses west of the brook; east of it were only two or three dwellings. The population was not more than twenty-five all told. Early tavern-keepers there were Jephtha Cheeseman, John Outcalt, Robert Watts, and Daniel Lott. Jacob I. Bergen, the mill-owner, was an early merchant. Christian Van Nortwick was another.

The present merchants west of Lawrence's Brook are Philip Kuhlthau and Dennis Vanderbilt, and there are also located there a brick Methodist Church, erected in 1872, at a cost of fourteen thousand dollars, the factories of the Meyer Rubber Company, covering a considerable acreage, and many substantial and comfortable dwellings. East of the brook are the Meyer Rubber Company's box-factory, two stores, two meat-markets, a German Reformed Church, two taverns, and quite a number of dwellings. The population of the village is about four hundred. The post-office was established Dec. 13, 1870. Philip Kuhlthau was commissioned postmaster, and still retains the office.

Milltown has a large German population, whose love of music led, in 1880, to the organization of two cornet bands, one of nineteen, the other of twenty pieces, with John Fuchs and George Schlosser as their respective leaders.

LIVINGSTON PARK.—This is the name by which a hamlet is known containing a union chapel and eight dwellings, and located a little north and west of the centre of the township, on the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Trenton and New Brunswick turnpike. This turnpike is locally known as Livingston Avenue, it being a continuation of an avenue of that name of New Brunswick. A large tract of land there was inherited by Mrs. Henry K. Haw; and, in 1865, Mr. Haw had it surveyed into lots, which he offered for sale at a low price, in the hope of gathering sufficient population at that point to induce the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to make it a stopping-place for trains between New Brunswick and Trenton. This hope was not yet realized at Mr. Haw's death, in 1876, since which time no effort has been put forth for the attainment of that end.

ADAMS STATION.—This is a flag-station on the Pennsylvania Railroad, a little south of the centre of the township, and is the only railway station in North Brunswick.

Taverns.—The "Red Lion" tavern, on George's road, about the centre of the township, north and south, has been built more than a century, and was formerly the scene of sundry public meetings and local jollifications. It is now merely a halting-place for travelers over this thoroughfare.

The "Black Horse" tavern was erected on George's road, near the present southeastern boundary of the township, some time during the latter half of the seventeenth century, as is supposed.

The Brunson hotel, in the northwestern part of the township, was built about 1800, and was later, for a number of years, kept by Daniel B. Brunson. At his death he was succeeded by his son, who, after doing the honors of the house several years, sold the stand to Richard De Mott. After the death of Mr. De Mott, in 1850, the hotel was managed by his widow two years, when a German from New York purchased and renamed it the "Hines House." In 1873 he sold it to John Tolen, who has since repaired and renovated it, leasing it to other parties.

Local Nomenclature.—Bodine's Corners is the name, derived from pioneers there, of a neighborhood on George's road in the northern part of the township. Three-Mile Run is a name which in common use designates a small portion of North Brunswick and Franklin (Somerset County) townships, near a stream of that name. Six-Mile Run is a title similarly applied to another neighborhood, also on the county line, farther south.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HENRY H. BOOREAM.

The subject of this biographical sketch was the son of Joseph Booream, an enterprising farmer, residing at Matchaponix, Middlesex Co., who married, in January, 1798, Miss Abigail Potter. Their children were Gilbert, born in 1797; Jane, whose birth occurred in 1799; Joseph, born in 1802; Elizabeth, in 1803; Nicholas, in 1807; Henry H., in 1811; and Sychee Maria, in 1813.

Mrs. Booream's death took place April 11, 1865, her age having been generally believed to have exceeded one hundred years.

Their son, Henry H., was born Oct. 6, 1811, at Matchaponix, where his early life was spent upon the farm of his father. He later acquired the mason's trade under the direction of his brother, which was successfully followed until failing health compelled its abandonment, when he pursued the business of marketing. In 1837 he purchased the property now the home of his widow, where he resided during the remainder of his life. He was on the 28th of February, 1833, married to Maria, daughter of Garret Van Liew, of North Brunswick, whose birth occurred Nov. 20, 1812. Their children were Garret Van Liew, born Dec. 7, 1833, who married Miss Martha Gilliland, Dec. 6, 1855, and Mary Elizabeth, born Sept. 29, 1836. She was married to Daniel G. Stubblefine, and had three children, of whom one, Henry L., is still living. Mrs. Stubblefine died Sept. 29, 1866.

Mr. Booream was a dealer in general produce, and followed the business of marketing during his active career, having been generally regarded as a successful man. He was also a man of much public spirit, and participated in all enterprises having the interest of the township of North Brunswick in view. He was in politics a Republican, and at the time of his death was the chosen freeholder of the township. He had also been for twenty years its collector, and held other offices of minor importance. He was an exemplary member of the Reformed (Dutch) Church of New Brunswick, N. J., in which he was formerly a deacon. Mr. Booream was greatly esteemed, not less for his capacity and energy than for his integrity. He enjoyed the reputation of having a more profound knowledge of the township interests than any other resident, and by his watchfulness and executive ability aided greatly in reducing its expense account.

The death of Mr. Booream occurred Jan. 10, 1879, in his sixty-eighth year. As a useful public man, his place cannot be readily filled.

HENRY K. HOW.

The earliest members of the How family, who are of English lineage, located in Burlington, N. J., the grandfather of the subject of this biography having been John How, who was united in marriage to Mary Ann Blanchard. Their children were James, a clergyman who settled in Delaware; William, Anna, Jane, who became Mrs. Fairbairn, and Samuel Blanchard. The last-named son was born Oct. 14, 1790, at Burlington, and graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1811. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia as a minister of the gospel in 1813, and was first settled at Salisbury, Pa., where he remained two years. He was then called to Trenton, N. J., where he resided for five years, after which he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick. He later removed to Savannah, Ga., where he was for seven years pastor of the Independent Church of that city. After filling for a brief period the presidency of Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, he engaged in a new enterprise in New York, and on the 18th of May, 1832, accepted a call to the First Reformed Church of New Brunswick, N. J., where he remained until his resignation, June 14, 1861, on account of failing health. Dr. How's ministerial labors in New Brunswick were eminently successful. During the twenty-nine years of his pastorate there were received into the membership of the church five hundred and thirty-eight persons on profession, and two hundred and twenty-five by certificate from other churches, in all the large number of seven hundred and sixty-three. His relations with his people were harmonious and cordial, and his death was sincerely lamented by all who knew him.

The doctor was first married to Miss Mary Snowden, to whom were born children: Cornelia (Mrs. Potts), Henry K., and Samuel B., who died in early childhood. Mrs. How died Dec. 12, 1837, and he married a second time, Miss Mary Ann, daughter of Chief Justice Kirkpatrick and his wife, Jane Bayard. Dr. How died March 1, 1868, in his seventy-ninth year, and his wife on the 17th of April, 1882, in her ninetieth year.

Henry K. How was born April 21, 1825, in Savannah, Ga., and during childhood removed with his parents to Carlisle, Pa. He later became a resident of New Brunswick, where he began a course of study preparatory to entering Rutgers College, from which he graduated in 1842. He then entered the Theological Seminary with the intention of studying for the ministry, but was compelled by failing health to relinquish his purpose.

After a brief residence in Texas he engaged in the drug business in New Brunswick, and subsequently removed to Trenton, where he embarked in business. He afterwards returned to New Brunswick, but at the time of his death was a resident of the township of North Brunswick. He was married in 1857 to Miss Mary, daughter of John Kinnan, of New Brunswick, to whom were born children: John K. and Mary Blanchard. Mr. How was in politics a staunch Democrat, and although at all times manifesting a keen interest in public affairs he cared little for official distinctions, and could not be induced to accept office. His excellent judgment and practical wisdom made his services invaluable to the township of his residence, and measures having for their aim improvements which redounded to the public welfare met from him a hearty sympathy.

He was not only president but one of the founders of the Farmers' Club of Middlesex County, and member of the State Agricultural Society. Mr. How possessed fine mental endowments and a ripe culture, which, had his health enabled him to pursue a professional career, would doubtless have led to distinction in any field of labor. Both himself and wife were members of the First Reformed Dutch Church of New Brunswick. The death of Henry K. How occurred on Sabbath morning, June 20, 1875, in the fifty-first year of his age.

PHILLIP KUHLTHAU.

The town of Oberzell, Kurhessen, Germany, was the early home of the Kuhlthau family, where the grandfather of the subject of this biographical sketch was engaged in agricultural employments. He was married and became the father of four children, among whom was John Henry, who was born and resided in the town above named. The latter was married to Barbara Lins, also a native of Oberzell, and had children: Anna Margaretta, Conrad, Phillip, A. Elizabeth, Eva Margaret, Henry, William, Kuni-gunda, John, Barbara, and Seaman.

Phillip, of this number, was born at Oberzell on the 22d of October, 1829, where his boyhood was spent at school. At the age of sixteen he was employed and filled for two years the position of clerk on the public highway. Having determined to explore the resources of the New World, he, in 1848, emigrated to America, and, landing in New York, finally located in Middlesex Co., N. J. He for two years engaged in farm labor, and was for the succeeding three years employed by the Ford Rubber Company, at Milltown. In August, 1852, he decided to visit the fatherland, mainly for the purpose of seeing again his maternal grandfather, to whom he was strongly attached. On his return the following year he brought to America his parents and their family.

Mr. Kuhlthau again became an employé of the Ford Rubber Company until April, 1855, when he determined to engage in business pursuits, and opened a grocery store at Milltown, in a building 16 by 32 feet in dimensions.

This enterprise steadily increased in magnitude until more spacious apartments were found necessary, and its owner ultimately became one of the leading merchants of the village. He also, in 1856, erected a residence adjoining the store, which he now occupies.

Mr. Kuhlthau was on Feb. 17, 1856, married to Miss Catherine, daughter of Christopher Klein, of Milltown, N. J. They have had children: John H., Philip C., Mary A., Catherine, Conrad W., and three who are deceased.

Mr. Kuhlthau is in politics a Republican, and has been honored by various public offices. He has been freeholder of North Brunswick for two years, member of the township committee for ten years, justice of the peace for five years, commissioner of deeds six years, collector, and postmaster for twelve years of the village of Milltown.

He is a man of much enterprise, and has been active in the purchase of property and the improvement of the village. Mr. Kuhlthau is also a trustee of the Van Liew Cemetery Association. He is in connection with his mercantile enterprises actively engaged in farming. Both Mr. and Mrs. Kuhlthau are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Milltown, of which the former is both trustee and steward.

CHAPTER XCIX.

EAST BRUNSWICK.¹

Situation and Boundaries.—This township is situated nearly in the centre of Middlesex County north and south, varying only a little from the same position in the county east and west in the latter direction, the town of Washington, on its northeastern border, occupying a position which well-nigh entitles its citizens to claim it as the geographical centre of the county. Dunham's Corners, near the centre of the township, is about equidistant from the city of New Brunswick lying to the northward and Jamesburg to the southward.

The township is bounded northwest by North Brunswick and New Brunswick, north by New Brunswick and Raritan, northeast by Raritan and Sayreville, east by South Amboy, southeast by Madison and Monroe, south by Monroe, and southwest by South Brunswick, and, as is indicated by its boundaries, is very irregular in form. The town of Washington was formed from East Brunswick in 1870, reducing the area of the township somewhat, though it can hardly be said to have been thus far independent of East Brunswick in many important particulars. The area of the township, including the town named, is 13,130 acres. In 1880 the valuation of its real estate was $789,170, of its personal property $241,400. The total taxable valuation was $900,000. The population of the township was 3272, 675 of whom were voters. The total township indebtedness was $130,570.

Physical Features.—The surface of East Brunswick is generally rolling, and it declines unevenly from near the centre in all directions towards its borders, which are defined by streams, except where the township adjoins the eastern extremity of South Brunswick. Occupying nearly all of the territory between South River and Lawrence's Brook, two important tributaries to the Raritan, which flows along its northern boundary between the points of confluence with the two streams mentioned, fully one-half of its southern boundary is formed by Grog Brook, a tributary to Lawrence Brook, and which, like a number of small tributaries to all of the streams mentioned, has its source within its borders. These streams afford an ample drainage to the township, and at places good water-powers, which have long been utilized to a considerable extent by manufacturers. South River is navigable for sloops and schooners as far up as Old Bridge, and vessels of greater tonnage have been floated by its waters between its mouth and Washington.

The soil of East Brunswick is composed of red shale and sandy loam reddish in color, measurably productive, and very adhesive when wet. Extensive beds of plastic and fire-clays underlie the surface of a large portion of the township, which are admirably adapted for the manufacture of fire-brick and other articles of a similar composite character, the utilization and sale of which have for many years formed a prominent feature in the business history of the township. These clays are found in regular beds. Some of them are of the purest and most refractory kind, and very pure quartz is found to mix with and give body to them. In the vicinity of Washington such beds are very large and especially rich. Stoneware and pottery clays are also obtained in the township, and have a large market. At Old Bridge and Washington the manufacture of potters' wares was formerly a prominent industry.

Bog-iron ore is found in many of the moist and swampy tracts about Spottswood, and was an article of transportation and commerce within the memory of a few of the older residents there.

Timber was formerly plentiful in all parts of the township, but most of it has long since disappeared before the axes of the wood-cutters and ship-builders, who once played a prominent part in its industrial history. A plateau of elevated land a little remote from South River was covered with a growth of timber as hardy and as luxuriant as any in the central and eastern portions of New Jersey, and, as converted into merchantable form, was the most important article of commerce in the township during the period of its rapid development from a wooded to an agricultural condition. Nearly every kind of timber native to this climate was found in plentitude, principal among which commercially were pine, cedar, maple, and nearly all of the varieties of oak, the latter being especially adapted to the requirements of the ship-builder, and ash in more limited quantities was also found.

Settlement.—John Reid, of Edinburgh, Scotland, who became deputy surveyor of East Jersey under Keith, Oct. 13, 1685, made a somewhat rude but measurably accurate map, which is in possession of Hon. William A. Whitehead, of Newark, and the only copy of which extant is the property of Mr. Charles D. Deshler, of New Brunswick. This map, which is very interesting to the student of the early history of the older portions of the present county of Middlesex, is designated by the following curious and verbose title: "A mapp of Rariton River, Millstone River, South River, Raway River, Bound Brook, Green brook, Cedar brook, with the Plantations thereupon; also these on Chinkwarora; Wickatank, the Heads of Hop River, and Manasquam, likewise appends on Hackingsack River, &c." As shown by this map, land had been taken up at and contiguous to the present site of the town of Washington by P. Sonmans, T. Fulerton, G. Lawry, D. Mudy, C. Gordon, R. Gordon, William Docwra, I., J., or T. Forbes, R. Hardie and I., J., or T. Mudy; and Law Baker had taken up thirteen hundred acres farther north, and extending within the present limits of the city of New Brunswick. A corner of a tract of one thousand acres assigned to P. Sonmans, and lying mostly northwest of Lawrence's Brook, was southeast of that stream, and consequently within the present boundaries of East Brunswick. The lots which included the present town of Washington were long and narrow, extending east and west, bounded east by South River, the present eastern limit of the township and village. The names of some of those above referred to will be recognized as those of men prominent in the history of East Jersey at a period prior and subsequent to that date, and some of them as those of men who were early large purchasers of lands south of the Raritan, probably for speculative purposes. None of them were ever residents of the territory described, and none of their descendants are known ever to have lived in the vicinity.

Hartshorne Willett settled on the bank of South River, directly in front of the present town of Washington, about 1720. He was of English descent, and a grandson of Sir Thomas Willett, baron, the ancestor of the well-known family of Willett in America. He was the owner of considerable land where he located, and by intermarriage his immediate family became connected with about all of the families who came to the township at an early date. Samuel Willett, a descendant of Hartshorne Willett, was long a resident at Washington, and died leaving a large family of daughters, who reside in that village, and are the pioneer's great-granddaughters.

The first Barkelew of whom any one in the township has any knowledge was Abraham, who was born in 1720, and doubtless came to the section while yet a comparatively young man. He located on the lower road to Old Bridge from Washington, where James Bissett now lives, and was one of the largest property-owners of his day. His son, Runyon Barkelew, located near Washington, on the main road to Old Bridge, and was the father of Vincent, who lived in Washington; Abraham, a farmer, who lived about a mile from Washington, on the road to Milltown; and Stephen H., who lived on the old Ogdén property, about ten miles and a half from Washington, all of whom are dead. Enoch, son of Vincent, and Isaac and Lemuel, sons of Stephen H., are living in East Brunswick. So extensive was the tract of land owned by the progenitor of this family, Abraham Barkelew, that he is often referred to as "Barkelew the landgrave."

The Oberts, Peter G., Paul, Henry, and John, came early to the township. Henry owned the square bounded east by South River and north by Main Street, Washington. Peter located at first on property at Washington, owned at an earlier date by George Obert, father of the brothers named, and afterwards removed to the early home of the latter, between Washington and Milltown. Paul lived near him, on the New Brunswick road. John was a Baptist preacher, and preached occasionally in the township years ago. The only male representative of the family living in the vicinity is John Shepard Obert, of Washington, now at an advanced age.

The Vreeland family were among the pioneers, as were also the Vandeventers and the Manabaus. The Vandeventers and Manabaus were prominent among the early boatmen on South River.

The Stults family are of German origin. Two brothers, Jacob and John, settled in East Brunswick in 1785. Of the family of Jacob the writer has no knowledge. John purchased a farm about three miles from Washington, on what is known as the New road, and was until his death a highly-respected citizen. His children were Henry, Elizabeth, Mary, Jemima, and Frederick. The daughters all married and are now dead. Henry and Frederick are living at the ages of 86 and 84, respectively. Both have been judges of the Court of Common Pleas of Middlesex County and justices of the peace. Frederick learned the trade of a weaver, but followed it only a short time, leaving it to engage in the hotel business. Three years later he became a merchant and speculator in wood. He was appointed justice of the peace in 1844 in North Brunswick township, before the division, and since the erection of East Brunswick has been repeatedly elected to the same office. Henry is the father of a numerous family, members of which have become wealthy as the result of gigantic business operations.

The Booraems are of Holland Dutch extraction, and the name has long been well known in the township. The early home of the family there was at Bergen's Mills, now known as Milltown, and the father of the present generation was Jonathan Booraem, who was born at Bergen's Mills. He became a millwright and house- and ship-carpenter, and, either alone or in company with his sons, was long a boat-builder at Washington. His sons, William, Nicholas, Thomas, and James, were well known to the earlier residents of East Brunswick, and Nicholas and Thomas are still living at Washington, the former yet engaged in the handicraft of his father.

The Messlers are an old family. The first of the name who was known to have lived in East Brunswick was Simon Messler, who had located there prior to the Revolution, in which he fought in the American ranks. His sons, Jacob, Vincent, and Abraham, are remembered, and it is possible there were others not well known in their time in the section, or who died young. Abraham and Jacob lived and died in the township, and the descendants of Abraham live there now. Abraham's sons were named Abraham, James, David, Crommeline, and William. His daughters, Martha, Esther, and Mary, married three brothers, Benjamin, Richard, and Henry Serviss, and many descendants of each of them are living in East Brunswick.

John J. Serviss was an early resident in the township. Whether his father was there before him is unknown. His property has come down to living descendants, through Richard to Richard his son and others. Richard occupies a portion of the old family homestead, the house itself and a part of the original farm being in possession of George Askew. David Serviss, the present township clerk of East Brunswick, is a son of Richard, and a great-grandson of John J. Serviss.

Abraham Ackerman had settled in East Brunswick previous to the Revolution, living on the John Curtin place, and his family was a highly-respectable one. His sons, James and Clyde, are well remembered. James had a son named Abraham, and lived on part of the paternal property. James, a son of Abraham, is now living in the township.

It was among the earlier pioneers in East Brunswick that Benjamin Ogden cast his lot. His property was on the river road from Washington to Old Bridge, where the late Stephen H. Barkelew formerly lived. Descendants of Ogden's intermingled with the Willetts, and none of the name now reside in the vicinity.

Benjamin Norman was a large land-owner in the township, and was among the early settlers. He lived on the elevation near South River, on the Old Bridge turnpike and Washington road, and was prominent and highly esteemed. No one bearing the name is now known to be living in East Brunswick.

An early and well-known resident was Isaac Van Deventer, son of Christopher Van Deventer, progenitor of the numerous family of that name living in Sayreville.

Peter Letts was in the township before the Revolution. The Letts family became numerous, many of the name now living in Sayreville. Of a generation later than that of the original Peter Letts there were three Peter Lettses. Ezekiel Letts, of Washington, is a descendant of the Peter Letts of pioneer days.

Smith Tunison was early located on the hill south of Lawrence's Brook, where his father had lived before him.

Garret Van Arsdalen and Thomas Walker settled early on Lawrence's Brook.

The name of Combs was early and long a familiar one to residents in East Brunswick. John and Jonathan Combs were brothers and sons of Samuel Combs, who owned considerable property in the township, and lived at Fresh Ponds. Jonathan was a farmer and prominent resident in the same vicinity, and John was long a merchant and ship-owner at Washington.

At an early date Capt. Jehu Dunham settled at Dunham's Corners, a locality which came to be so known in his honor, and left a numerous family, none of whom reside in East Brunswick. James Dunham, merchant, died many years ago, leaving valuable property. He is referred to as a gentleman held in the highest esteem for probity and business capacity. The father of Capt. Jehu Dunham was a resident in North Brunswick, near the Raritan, where the latter was born.

James Crommelin was a pioneer on the creek bearing his name, and was a leading citizen in his time and well regarded. His property is now occupied by a canning-factory, which has given an appearance of life and activity to its neighborhood.

A family of Wyckoffs were at one time, many years since, prominent in the township. At an early date they lived on Crommelin's Creek, removing thence to New Brunswick. Peter and John Wyckoff, of the second generation resident there, were quite well known in the township. The former home of this family is now owned by Terrence Claney.

The name of Samuel Gordon, hotel-keeper, stage proprietor, contractor, and general business man, is well remembered in connection with several enterprises of a time gone by for the general improvement of traveling and transportation facilities. His son, Samuel Gordon, is a resident of Washington, and at the age of eighty-three still busy with various light mechanical pursuits. He is one of the most remarkable mechanical geniuses the section has produced, and excels as painter, carpenter, wheelwright, or cabinet-maker, always so combining the durable and the beautiful as to render the result of his handicraft valuable both ornamentally and intrinsically.

The Martin family, of whom Samuel Martin, boatman, was the progenitor, is numerous and well known. Samuel Martin married a woman of the Willett family, and had a number of sons and daughters. His sons, Willett, Henry, Julius, and Samuel, took up the occupation of their father, embarking as pilots and captains of steamboats, and became celebrated as pilots while yet comparatively young. Samuel became noted also in the special department of coast-piloting, taking several steamers to California through Magellan's Straits. He was lately in command of the steamer "Plymouth Rock," plying between New York and Long Branch, and the large Coney Island steamer "Tanrus." The reputation of these men among steamboaters is unsurpassed.

An early settlement and clearing was made on the Outcalt mill-site by a half-breed named Weechquechley, who was a sagamore and a man of note among the Indians. Just when he became possessed of property there can scarcely be conjectured at this time, but it is supposed to have been years before white settlement began in the vicinity or the Indian title to land there was extinguished. He owned a considerable tract of land, and had a rude saw-mill as far back as tradition extends. When he left the locality and how he disposed of his property are not known. Evidences of his former residence and operations there in the form of half-buried remains of his improvements are all that has ever been visible of them to any living person.

Captain Samuel Leonard early owned a large tract of land in the neighborhood of Weechquechley's property, and tradition has it that a brother of his lived on it contemporaneously with the half-breed's residence there. There is a vague story to the effect that one of the Leonards, but neither the captain nor the brother mentioned, was murdered by Weechquechley. Conflicting versions of the tragedy have been recounted. The most plausible one, and the one accepted by some of the older residents of Spottswood and vicinity as probably nearly correct, is to the effect that as Mr. Leonard was one day walking in his brother's garden adjoining the half-breed's land, carrying his brother's child in his arms, Weechquechley, who had been lying in wait for him concealed behind some shrubbery, shot him, killing him instantly. The alleged murderer's enmity against Leonard is supposed to have been aroused by some conflicting claims concerning the ownership or right of use of the mill privilege. By some it is thought Weechquechley was not the murderer, but that another half-breed was, and that other property than the mill-seat was in dispute. It is said the murderer was hanged for his crime, while Weechquechley is not supposed to have so died.

It is probable, though not by any means certain, that for a considerable period prior to the Revolution James Perry, Peter Corne, and Thomas Hays lived at Spottswood, where they had a forge. At least some one in their employ who operated the concern must have been located there, and doubtless one or two or all three of the members of the "Forge Company," resided there much of the time.

Among the early residents of Spottswood was John Lewis Johnston, a descendant of the Johnston family, for many generations of Spottiswoode, Scotland, who represented an important landed interest at Spottswood, vested in his father, John Johnston, who then lived or had previously lived at Perth Amboy. The part taken by Mr. Johnston in the early affairs of the locality was a conspicuous one. He was one of the founders of St. Peter's Church.

Others who were referred to as inhabitants of the town of Spottswood as early as 1773, and who were also founders of St. Peter's parish, were Frederick Bucklen, John Barclay, Jr., Thomas Newton, James Rue, Samuel Neilson, David Stout, John Rue, Joseph Perrine, James Abraham, Richard Lott, John Perrine, John Rue, and Right Hon. David Carnegie, commonly called "Lord Rosehill," but it is certain that some of these, and probable that others, did not at the time have a permanent residence within the present limits of East Brunswick. Descendants of some of those mentioned—the Rues, Stout, and Perrine—now live at and near Spottswood, and some of the names are at this time familiar in various sections of Middlesex County. Land in the township was deeded to James Rue in 1785 by Johannes Van Leuwen, of Somerset County, and Jeromus Lott, of Kings County, N. Y. He came from Monmouth County considerably earlier, as is supposed. James, his son, and James, his grandson, have been his successors. Joseph Perrine settled early in Madison, near Spottswood. He was much at Spottswood, where he was well known, until his death in 1797. His son John, father of Judge John Perrine, lived at Spottswood from 1805 to 1812. Judge John Perrine located at Old Bridge in 1829, and removed to Spottswood in 1831, and was a leading business man there for many years. Since his retirement he has lived on the Bloomfield mill property, between Spottswood and Old Bridge.

The Mundys were quite early at Spottswood, where Phineas Mundy was prominent as a property-owner and business man for many years, dating from some time early in the present century. Merril Mundy, of this family, now at an advanced age, is a resident of the village.

The advent in the township of John, father of Asher Bissett, the progenitor of the present large family of the name resident there, was some time prior to the Revolution. He located at Old Bridge, and remained there until his death; Asher also lived and died there. Perhaps the better known of the sons of the latter were Asher and David. Asher was a large land-owner, and served Middlesex County as sheriff. He left several sons and one daughter. David was a manufacturer and business man at Old Bridge. The Bissetts have ever been men of character, well regarded by their fellow-citizens. Well known among many of the name in the township at this time are James Bissett, brick manufacturer, F. W. Bissett, merchant, Evert Bissett, retired, and William Bissett.

The Van Wickle family were early at Old Bridge. By intermarriage several of the prominent families of that part of the town are related to them. They doubtless settled there as early as 1765 or 1770. Michael Van Wickle was a member of the Middlesex County board of freeholders in 1778 and 1779, and Evert Van Wickle was a justice of the peace, 1795-97. The family were extensive land-owners in the vicinity of Old Bridge, and early in the present century some of them were leading business men there. Evert Van Wickle was a surveyor, and in 1800 or a little later went to the Holland Purchase in Western New York as surveyor for Judge Philip Church, proprietor of the Church tract in Allegany County.

James and Leonard Appleby, from Monmouth County, became well-known citizens of East Brunswick, where many of the descendants of both now live. James came to Old Bridge in 1829, and the two began a mercantile career there as partners in a store, and both resided in the township during life. James was three times married, and reared a large family. His son, William M. Appleby, is a merchant at Old Bridge, and other sons are well known in East Brunswick and elsewhere. Leonard Appleby was prominent in social and business life for many years, and died at an advanced age in 1879.

Gen. Obadiah Herbert is well remembered as having carried on important business enterprises at Old Bridge. Obadiah Herbert, grandfather of Gen. Herbert, was a resident at Perth Amboy previous to 1757. He had a family of six sons and two daughters. One of these sons, Obadiah, was a farmer, and, like his father, a surveyor. He married Elizabeth Warne, and had children,—John, William, Obadiah, Elizabeth, and Sarah. About 1870, Obadiah, last mentioned, and known as Gen. Herbert, came to Old Bridge, where he married a daughter of Judge Jacob Van Wickle. She died, and he subsequently married a daughter of Amos Stout, who survives him. His sons are Jacob, Robert S., and J. Biddle Herbert. He had three daughters.

Gen. James Morgan was a settler at Old Bridge soon after the Revolution, and was interested with some of the Van Wickles in business enterprises. He was an uncle to Andrew J. Disbrough, surveyor (son of John Disbrow, a light-horseman in the Revolution), who has been postmaster at Old Bridge continuously since 1836, was justice of the peace, 1840-80, and county judge, 1874-79, and was elected sheriff of Middlesex County in 1881.

The Skinners, an old family at Spottswood, are descended from John Skinner, who came to that place from England. He married Elizabeth Ford, and his sons were William (died in infancy), Lewis Ford (a sailor), Ford C. (a shoemaker), Benjamin F. (manufacturer), William (died in Philadelphia), and Phineas Manning. The latter was a paper-maker by trade, but was a snuff manufacturer for some time before his death. He had three sons and five daughters. Of these, William A. and Lewis E. Skinner are prominent residents of Spottswood.

It is believed that this chapter embraces an account, more or less full, of all of the settlers in the township during the pioneers' period, and that succeeding it in which the enterprises of a later day had an inception. No pains has been spared to render this department of the history of East Brunswick complete, and every available source of information has been consulted with a view to that end. A good many of the early settlers had slaves for some time after they came. Many of the latter are buried in the township, and it is said some of the colored residents of the present day are descended from some of them.

During the Revolution many citizens of the State sustained such loss or damage to property as is incident to a time of war or the presence of armed forces depending upon the country for subsistence. Among claims against government presented at a later day, in consequence of alleged loss or damage from the causes mentioned, were the following, sworn to according to law, by residents within the borders of East Brunswick:¹

Organization and Civil History.—By an act of the Senate and General Assembly of New Jersey, approved Feb. 28, 1860, all those parts of the townships of North Brunswick and Monroe lying within the following limits, viz.: "Beginning at the mouth of Lawrence's Brook, where it falls into the Raritan River; thence southwesterly up the said Lawrence's Brook to where Ireland's Brook falls into the said Lawrence's Brook and line of the township of South Brunswick; thence southeasterly up said Ireland's Brook and line of South Brunswick to the township line of Monroe; thence southwesterly along the township line of South Brunswick and Monroe to the line known as Bass' patent line; thence southerly and easterly along said Bass' patent to Manalapan River; thence northeasterly down Manalapan River to the mouth of the stream that drains the burnt meadows; thence up the stream thereof to Slab Bridge; thence a due east course to Matchaponix River and the line of South Amboy; thence northerly down the Matchaponix and South Rivers to the mouth thereof at Raritan River; thence northwesterly up Raritan River to the mouth of Lawrence's Brook and beginning," were set off from the townships mentioned and established a separate township, to be known as the township of East Brunswick; and it was enacted that the inhabitants of the new township and their successors should be constituted a body politic and corporate by the name of the "Inhabitants of the Township of East Brunswick, in the County of Middlesex."

It was further enacted that the inhabitants of East Brunswick should hold their first town-meeting at the inn of Stephen H. Barkalew, in the said township, at the time appointed by law for holding the annual town-meetings in the other townships of Middlesex County; and that on the first Tuesday of the following May the town committees of North Brunswick, East Brunswick, and New Brunswick (which was formed at the same time with East Brunswick) should meet at the inn of Saxon M. Tice, in East Brunswick, at ten A.M., to allot, divide, and assign to the townships of East Brunswick and New Brunswick such portions of all the real estate and personal property and of all surplus moneys of the parent town of North Brunswick then on hand as the taxable property and ratables of those parts of the townships of New Brunswick and East Brunswick which were taken from the township of North Brunswick bore to the whole taxable property and ratables of the former town of North Brunswick, according to the last assessment, the townships of New Brunswick and South Brunswick to pay, in like proportion, existing indebtedness of the township of North Brunswick, and the poor chargeable upon the old township to be divided according to the same rule of proportion between the three townships named.

The act also provided that at ten A.M., on the third Tuesday of the following May, the town committees of Monroe and East Brunswick townships should meet at the public-house kept by Mrs. Van Cleef at Spottswood, to effect a similar apportionment of assets, liabilities, and township responsibilities between the townships of Monroe and East Brunswick, in the proportion of the amount of real estate and the number of taxable inhabitants of that portion of East Brunswick set off from Monroe to the whole amount of real estate and the number of taxable inhabitants of the township of Monroe as previously bounded.

That portion of the township of East Brunswick set off from Monroe was constituted a separate election district, to be known as the Spottswood Election District of East Brunswick, and the first election therein was ordered to be held at the hotel of Mrs. Van Cleef, at Spottswood village.

THE FIRST TOWN-MEETING.—The first town-meeting of the newly-erected township was held April 9, 1860, at the place appointed in the act. Stephen Martin was chosen moderator, and Henry Gordon clerk. The following resolutions were passed:

"On motion it was resolved that the sum of $500 be appropriated for the poor, as well as the interest of the surplus revenue for purpose aforesaid.

"Resolved, That the sum of $500 be appropriated for roads.

"Resolved, That the sum of $300 be appropriated for incidental expenses.

"Resolved, That the sum of $3 per scholar for all children residing in the township between the ages of five and eighteen be appropriated for school purposes.

"Resolved, That the next meeting be held at ten o'clock A.M., and that the vote at said meeting shall be by ballot.

"Resolved, That the next fall and State election shall be held at the house of S. H. Barkalew, in the village of Washington.

"Resolved, That the next annual town-meeting be held at the house of Enos Ayres.

"Resolved, That three constables be elected in East Brunswick."

Civil List.—The following is a complete list of the officers elected at the first town-meeting:

B. F. Lloyd, judge of election; Stephen Smith, assessor; S. H. Barkelew, collector; Henry Gordon, clerk; Andrew Snowhill and James C. Stout, chosen freeholders; A. Vandewater, school superintendent; Leonard Appleby, R. S. Herbert, G. I. Snedeker, Furman Smith, and John Griggs, township committee; Richard Serviss, overseer of the poor; Lewis W. Spencer and Jeremiah Rappelyea, surveyors of highways; James Appleby, James Bissett, and George Lane, commissioners of appeals; Lemuel Barkelew, connection of the township with North Brunswick, and its later partial connection with Monroe, citizens within its present borders were prominently identified with the civil affairs of the two parental townships; the names of Jonathan Combs, Evert Van Wickle, James Crommelin, and others, residents within the present township limits at an early date, appearing often among those of North Brunswick officials, while those of Leonard Appleby and some of his contemporaries figured conspicuously in the records of Monroe before East Brunswick was erected.

James Jernee, and William Hardenbrook, constables; John Hoey, S. H. Barkelew, B. F. Lloyd, Enos Ayres, and James Jernee, pound-keepers; Andrew J. Disbrow, Ambrose Dobbs, and Leonard L. F. Appleby, justices of the peace; Phineas M. Skinner, George H. Snowhill, and I. L. Cole, judges of election in the Spotswood precinct; and Murrill Mundy, clerk of the same.

The following civil list embraces the names of the principal township officers chosen at the ensuing and subsequent elections:

Educational.—PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—At this time data cannot be secured upon which to base a particular history of the schools of the township in the earlier period of its civilization. Teachers and pupils have long since passed away, leaving no record of the schools of the time in which they lived, and the oldest living residents do not recall events connected with the earlier period of educational history. It is probable that from the time of the first settlement of any number of families contiguously within the present borders of the township measures were employed, as the exigencies of the times required, to establish and maintain schools under the successive regulations made by governmental authority to that end. Possibly the first regularly constituted public schools in the territory now embraced in the township were put in operation under the provisions of the act passed by the East Jersey Council in 1693, authorizing the appointment of a schoolmaster for each town, and sanctioning the employment of force to compel reluctant tax-payers to contribute their share for the support of public schools, and maintained with varying success until superseded by other public schools, opened at a later period by authority of the school laws of the State of New Jersey, and such select schools as have in all sections of the country borne so prominent a part in the advancement of the cause of public education. Doubtless a school of some sort was established in the settlement at South River (now the town of Washington) about as early as at any point within the limits of East Brunswick; but our information respecting this district reaches no farther back than the beginning of the present century, when a then old school-house stood on a hill near the grove which has so often been the scene of the summer festivities of the adjacent population. Frederick Stults, still living at an advanced age, taught a school in this building during 1824 and 1825. The present school-house was built in 1838, and was a one-story brick building. In 1852 it was enlarged, and another story was added to it, at a cost of $580. It was again renovated and repaired in 1867, at an expense of $900. It is now regarded as too small for the accommodation of the children of this populous district, and a new and more commodious building is felt to be a pressing necessity, but the project of erecting one has not as yet assumed any tangible form. Ira Gage Barnes taught a school at South River as early as 1829.

The above civil list embraces only that period during which East Brunswick has been an independent township. During the protracted period of the civil

The earliest schools at Spottswood are not remembered by any one now living, nor can the date at which the first public school-house there was erected be accurately fixed. The establishment of schools there was probably contemporary with a like advancement at Washington, and by some is claimed to have occurred at a date somewhat earlier. There was a school-house there as early as 1805, and Joshua Pittingu taught in it in 1806. It was torn down something less than twenty years ago, and has been superseded by the building now in use. Amusing stories of events connected with early schools at this place have been told by some of the old men of the vicinity who were school-boys there years ago. It is related by Judge John Perrine that it was common for the scholars to bar out the teacher if he manifested a desire to continue the regular sessions of the school during the interval between Christmas and New Year's, a period always eagerly claimed by the youth of that day and this as their peculiar season of jollity and freedom from the restraints of the school-room.

An early teacher at Old Bridge was the man who became famous during the Mexican war, and is known in history as Gen. Shields. When the first public school-house was built there is not now known. One which was long known as an old school-house gave place to the more modern structure now in use only a year or two ago.

Under the school law of the State of New Jersey the township was divided into districts, which have from time to time since undergone changes in boundaries and in number. Some of them are of late and one or two of comparatively recent origin. At this time there are eight districts, known by name and number as follows: Brick School-House, No. 30; Washington, No. 31; Lawrence Brook, No. 32; Summer Hill, No. 33; Dunham's Corners, No. 34; Old Bridge, No. 45; Spottswood, No. 36; South River, No. 74. The latter had only just been formed when this work went to press.

In 1881 the number of children of the school age in East Brunswick was 793, divided as follows among the several districts: District No. 30, 52; No. 31, 234; No. 32, 66; No. 33, 48; No. 34, 92; No. 35, 64; No. 36, 147; and No. 74, 90. The total amount received from all sources for public school purposes was $350 each in Districts No. 30, 32, 33, 34, and 35, $825 in No. 31, and $518.39 in No. 36. The value of school property in the several districts was as follows in 1880: District No. 30, $1000; No. 31, $1500; No. 32, $800; Nos. 33 and 34, $1200 each; No. 35, $1250; and No. 36, $2500. The average attendance in the several districts during the time the schools have been kept open (averaging eight and eight-tenths months) has been 23 in No. 30; 74 in No. 31; 12 in No. 32; 18 in No. 33; 27 in No. 34; 25 in No. 35; and 44 in No. 36. It is estimated that in the township 177 children attended private schools, and that 200 attended no school during the year. The schoolhouse in District No. 30 will seat 50 scholars; that in District No. 31, 66; that in District No. 32, 80; that in District No. 33, 80; that in District No. 34, 50; that in District No. 35, 75; and that in District No. 36, 100. These buildings are all of them in fair and some of them in excellent condition. Two male and seven female teachers were employed in the township, the former at an average salary of $43.50, the latter at an average salary of $32. District No. 74 having been only recently formed, has as yet no statistics other than the number of school children within its borders.

A BRANCH OF RUTGERS COLLEGE.—Under the supervision of Rev. Jacob R. Hardenbergh, a branch of Rutgers College was established at Spottswood in 1830 with the object of preparing classes to enter Rutgers for the senior year, affording the same facilities and the same course of study, with the same thorough system of instruction, that characterized Rutgers College, at a cost for board and other expenses considerably lower than at New Brunswick, and holding out special inducements to many living in the vicinity, who were thus enabled to live at home and enjoy the same educational advantages that were afforded to inmates of the college at New Brunswick. The successive teachers were Thomas O. Daniels, a graduate of Princeton; Jacob B. Gaddis, of Millstone, N. J., a graduate of Rutgers College; James Schureman Johnson, son of Dr. Johnson, then a resident physician of Spottswood; and John O. Brown, a resident of Rutgers College. The first and only class prepared here finished in 1834, under the tuition of Mr. Brown, and entered Rutgers College for the senior year, after which the Spottswood branch was discontinued, and the building which it had occupied was converted to public school purposes.

REV. WILLIAM O. WARD'S ACADEMIC SCHOOL.—In 1830, Rev. William O. Ward opened an academic school at Spottswood, where he was then rector of the Episcopal Church. It was patronized mostly by New Yorkers, though some of the students lived at and near Spottswood, and all, or nearly all, were members of families attached to the Episcopal Church. The school was, in fact, regarded as a rival to the branch of Rutgers College just alluded to, which was conducted, like the main institution, under the auspices of the Reformed Dutch Church, and at times the feelings of hostility of supporters of each against the other were marked. The course of study pursued at this school was thorough, and the instruction such as to render it measurably successful for some years.

REV. J. C. VAN LIEW'S SCHOOL.—From 1844 to 1848 Rev. John C. Van Liew, then pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church at Spottswood, conducted a private school at that place, which was patronized by fifty or sixty students, and was at the time one of the best educational institutions in New Jersey of its class, Rev. Mr. Van Liew having occupied a foremost position among educators in the State.

THE HOME BOARDING-SCHOOL FOR CHILDREN.—This institution is the outgrowth of a select school started in the upper part of the village of Old Bridge by Miss A. E. Conover in 1849. It was opened in one room of a cottage, which was burned in 1880, and continued there six months. In the mean time Miss Conover, perceiving that circumstances favored the establishment of a permanent school, erected a small school-house for the accommodation of her class, which now forms a part of a tenement-house owned by her.

The families resident at and near Old Bridge extended to Miss Conover a liberal patronage, and her school gradually increased in numbers as well as in popularity abroad till it became apparent that a boarding-school would meet with a remunerative patronage, Miss Conover being frequently solicited to accept the care of children as inmates of her home as well as members of her class. To meet this demand she enlarged her residence in 1865, and prepared for the accommodation of boarding pupils, receiving such as came and continuing the instruction of day pupils from the neighborhood until 1879, when the number of the first-mentioned class had so increased that she deemed it advisable to conduct the institution as a boarding-school exclusively, which is kept entirely within her residence.

The location of this school is very pleasant, and as healthy as any portion of the State. The characteristics of the house and its surroundings are such as to justly entitle the establishment to the name of the "Home Boarding-School." The care bestowed upon the inmates by Miss Conover is such as to make them feel like members of a common household, which takes the place of their respective homes to a remarkable degree. Scholars are received at any time and retained during vacation if desired. The terms are as low as is consistent with the accommodations and the thorough course of rudimentary instructions offered, and the establishment is easily and quickly accessible from New York and Philadelphia and intermediate points.

OTHER PRIVATE SCHOOLS.—At different periods other private schools of lesser note have been taught in the township. A successful one has been maintained at Washington, most of the time since 1861, by Mrs. Caroline Kline; and another for some time past by Mrs. C. H. Woolston, wife of the pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church.

Industrial Pursuits.—The fine water-power afforded by South River at Spottswood and in the vicinity of that village was made available by manufacturers at a period so remote that its date cannot be recalled. When white settlement there begun a half-breed Indian had the water-power now utilized by Outcalt's hominy-mills and a considerable acreage round about, where he was operating a primitive saw-mill. This person must have inherited a share of both the enterprise and the mechanical ingenuity of his white progenitors, whoever they may have been, if he constructed and operated this mill, as it is believed he did, though by some it is claimed that the mill was probably built for him by some adventurous Europeans who had doubtless penetrated, at a very early period, into this then almost uninhabited region from some settlement at a distance. The name of this man is said to be correctly spelled Weechqueechley, and it is pronounced by many Wa-queeley, a pronunciation which by others has been corrupted into McQueely. This property afterwards came into the possession of the Johnstons, represented at Spottswood in 1773 and probably much earlier by John Lewis Johnston, and has been long since by them conveyed to others.

The "Forge Company," composed of James Perry, Peter Corne, and Thomas Hays, played an early and conspicuous part in the primitive industrial history of this section. An old map made by the surveyor-general of New York, without date, but reasonably believed to have been drawn about 1750, and indicating the various parcels of real estate belonging to the "Forge Company," showed the location of a grist-mill on the site of the present old red mill occupied partially by the snuff-factory of Isaac De Voe & Son. This spot was named on the map "Penkridge." The forge proper, with a trip-hammer, was drawn on the margin of the map, and was on or near the site of the old saw-mill recently demolished. The "Forge Company" possessed many tracts or lots of land, which had been purchased evidently with the purpose of "charcoaling" the wood thereon for use in the manufacture of iron. There are sometimes found the remains of a coal-kiln, covered by the sandy soil and iron slag in such quantities as to interfere with digging about the site. At the time of the Revolution it appears the members of the company became refugees and fled to England, their property becoming forfeited in consequence after the success of American arms led to the establishment of a national government. In December, 1796, at a general auction sale, which was probably ordered by the State authorities, of various landed property formerly belonging to the "Forge Company," the mill-seat was "struck off" to Daniel Lott for £1275. In 1801 it was sold by the sheriff to Robinson Thomas. In 1819 the title to a half, and in 1827 to the remaining half, ownership in the mill-seat was purchased by John H. Disborough, who instituted enterprises there which belong to the more modern industrial history of the township.

SNUFF MANUFACTURE.—The manufacture of snuff and tobacco, long so prominent an interest at Spottswood, was introduced by Messrs. Daniel Snowhill and William Dill at a comparatively early date. Dill died about 1838, and Snowhill about 1840, the former having withdrawn from the business some years before. Mr. Snowhill was succeeded by his son, Andrew Snowhill, and he by Andrew Snowhill & Sons, who ceased operations about 1850. About 1868-78, George H. Snowhill, of the same family, was extensively engaged in the manufacture of fine-cut tobacco and cigars, commanding a large trade throughout the surrounding country.

In 1840, John Appleby purchased the Spottswood mill and water-power of Andrew Snowhill, who had bought it of the administrators of the will of John H. Disborough, and converted the old paper-mill into a tobacco and snuff-mill, the machinery for which Mr. Appleby removed from "Texas," as a locality in Monroe township is now known, where he had begun the manufacture of snuff in 1836. He conveyed the mill-seat in 1858 to his son, William Appleby, and Isaac DeVoe, who continued the business, which in the earlier years of the late civil war was so extensive as to require the use of twenty mortars or "mills," as they are commonly called. The war and the consequent taxation, with its incidental annoyance, reduced the business, besides changing its mode and character. It is, however, gradually recovering its former magnitude. In 1865, Isaac De Voe became sole owner, and the business is now continued by Isaac De Voe & Son.

John D. Outcalt had a snuff and tobacco manufactory at Spottswood about 1845. He was succeeded by his son John, who abandoned the business in 1870 to embark in a manufacturing enterprise of a different kind.

About 1818, John Browne, who had been on the ground in another line of business about twelve years, converted a distillery, two miles southwest of Spottswood, into a snuff-mill, which he operated nine years, and then sold it to William Dill and William Perrine, who, between four and five years later, sold out to Leonard Appleby, who, in 1866, was succeeded by Appleby & Helme. In 1879, George W. Helme became sole owner of the establishment, now known as the Railroad Mills. The mill is now a large brick building, the old wooden structure having most of it long since disappeared.

The Tecumseh Snuff-Mills of Skinner & Co. were established in May, 1854, by Phineas M. Skinner & Son, on the historical paper-mill property¹ on the Machaponix, in Madison township, near Spottswood, and are in a certain sense to be accounted among Spottswood industries.

John Dill, a son of William Dill, put a snuff-mill in operation at Old Bridge previous to 1860, and at his death was succeeded by his son William Dill, who continued the business until about 1875. A snuff-mill was operated for a time at Bloomfield. The Bloomfield mill-site is located partially in this township and partially in Madison. The manufactories which have been successively in operation there have been on the Madison side of the river, though the residence for many years of Judge Perrine, the former owner, on the same property, and within the borders of East Brunswick, has obtained for the place a claim to local mention.²

GRIST-MILLS.—The grist-mill known as the "old red mill," now occupied by Isaac De Voe & Son as a snuff-factory, was built by John Hilliker, from Staten Island, early in this century, on the ground long since occupied by the early grist-mill of the Forge Company. There has been evidence discovered that the previous mill had been burned, as in relaying the floor of the red mill cinders and scorched corn were dug up. The red mill was controlled at various times after Hilliker severed his connection with it by John H. Disborough, George H. Snowhill, and William Conover. John H. Disborough converted a part of the building and power into a paper-mill some time subsequent to 1827, and it was continued as such (a portion of the time by Beebe & Disborough) till 1840, when the property passed into the hands of John Appleby as has been stated.

The present Spottswood grist-mill, containing two runs of stones, was built by John Appleby about 1847, across the road from where it now stands, and was subsequently removed to its present location. It is owned by Isaac De Voe, and managed by Charles B. Hulit, lessee, who does a general merchant and custom business, which was never larger than at this time.

About 1867, Whitehead & De Voe built a grist-mill on Overt's dock, at Washington, which was operated as such only about a year, and has since been in use as a store-house.

SHIP-BUILDING.—Jonathan Booraem began building sloops and schooners at Washington, for river navigation, in 1824, and succeeding in the enterprise, subsequently built a large number of vessels, some of which are yet navigating South River. He trained his sons William, Nicholas, Thomas, and James in the trade of ship-building, and some of them continued the business after his retirement and death, making a reputation as ship-builders second to none. In 1832 he admitted some of his sons to partnership, and the firm was thereafter known as Jonathan Booraem & Sons until 1840, when the ship-yard passed into the possession of Nicholas and Thomas Booraem, who, under the firm-name of N. & T. Booraem, continued the business until 1851, when Nicholas Booraem became the sole proprietor. In 1854 the firm of N. & T. Booraem was revived, carrying on the business until 1860, when Nicholas Booraem again assumed entire ownership, continuing to build vessels quite extensively until within a few years and to overhaul and repair them to the present time, one of the conveniences of his ship-yard being a marine railway of improved construction. Among vessels built by the Booraems were the "President," a sloop, and the schooners "Christopher Columbus" and "Jonathan Booraem." Besides many vessels for river navigation, they built some coasting schooners ranging from one hundred and fifty to three hundred and fifty tons burden.

Maj. Samuel Peterson, who died many years ago, made his mark as a ship-carpenter, building at Washington several large sea-schooners and one sea-steamer, which was rated first-class. At Old Bridge, Gen. Obadiah Herbert had some few vessels built between 1837 and 1840.

THE FRUIT-CULTURE AND TRADE.—At a comparatively early date large quantities of peaches were brought by wagons from West Jersey to tide-water at Washington for shipment to New York.

Samuel Whitehead, Sr., a native of England, came to America at the age of twenty and purchased and located on a large tract of land about four miles from Washington, with the intention of devoting himself to agricultural pursuits, but engaged in the peach trade largely, buying from West Jersey and sending to the city markets. Finding the soil suitable for the cultivation of apple, peach, and other fruit trees, he planted the seed of several choice varieties of apples and peaches and gave his attention and industry to the cultivation of nursery stock, which he later set out, planting fine orchards, and becoming so successful as a fruit-grower as to attract general attention to that industry, in which the neighboring farmers engaged one after another until the cultivation of peaches was the leading pursuit of the land-owners for miles round about, and an immense trade grew up, of which Washington naturally became the depot. This trade flourished from 1825 to 1855, and was at its height about 1850. At first sloops, then schooners, and later steamboats were employed in carrying fruit to New York, and from 1840 to the time when the business began to decline on account of failing crops from four to six steamers left Washington daily loaded to their utmost capacity with peaches. The business thus introduced by Mr. Whitehead, who gave to several kinds of peaches the names by which they are known in the markets to this day, gradually extended to neighboring counties and became important over a wide area, which was for years a leading source of supply to the fruit markets of New York.

SAND, CLAY, AND KAOLIN.—Retiring from fruit-culture with an ample fortune, Samuel Whitehead, Sr., established another trade, which ranks with the most important enterprises of the day, and has made all concerned in it wealthy. He searched for and found, upon the lands in East Brunswick and adjoining townships adjacent to the river navigation, fire-sands and clay-moulding sands, and by the purchase of such sand and clay beds became in a few years almost the only source of supply to New York and surrounding cities of those articles, employing a large number of men and teams in digging and carting them to docks, supplying freights to numerous vessels, thus affording profitable employment to hundreds and amassing a large fortune, taking rank at his retirement with the wealthiest men of the section. His sons had grown to manhood before this enterprise was fairly established, and Mr. Whitehead trained them thoroughly in all branches of the business, imparting to each an accurate knowledge of the quality and suitableness of the material, which has proved of great benefit to them since their father, upon retiring about twenty years ago, transferred to them by sale his trade and extensive business, the firm being Whitehead Brothers, and its members, Charles, William, James, and John. Since that time, when about ten thousand tons were shipped per year, the Whitehead Brothers have gradually increased the business, purchasing lands adapted to it in all directions, and shipping now an average of two hundred thousand tons of sand and clay per annum, having extended their trade as far east as Boston and to Philadelphia westward. The several departments of this immense trade are supervised by Charles Whitehead at Washington, William Whitehead in New York, and John and James Whitehead on the Hudson River, the firm owning a number of large schooners, sloops, barges, and other vessels, all of which are employed in the transportation incident to their business, which is said to be so profitable as to clear quite a fortune every year.

W. S. Pettit's clay bank is near South River, and half a mile north of Washington. It is worked for the supply of the red brick yard near it and on the river. The following is the order of the several beds seen in the bank, and in the face of the hill above it, on the road leading west to the Old Bridge turnpike: (1) Reddish gravel and sand, 10 feet; (2) light-colored sandy clay, with layers of sand, 25 feet; (3) clay and sand alternating, 20 feet; (4) cemented sand (stone) 3 to 5 feet; (5) black clay, 5 feet; (6) laminated sand and sandy clay, containing lignite, at the bottom.

This level or working floor of the bank is eighteen feet above high water. Of the above-mentioned subdivisions only 3, 4, and 5 are excavated, and of these No. 4 is thrown aside. The black clay (5) is very tough and solid, and is the best in the bank, containing very little lignite and pyrite. In the bottom of the pit a light-colored sandy clay has been found, which burns hard and appears to be quite refractory, like the second quality of fire-clay. Northwest of the main bank there is an excavation for white sand, which is used in moulding. This lies below the level of the main bank, not more than ten feet above high tide. Just over it there crops out a dirty white sandy clay. Below the level of this sand, in the ditches northeast of the bank, there is sandy black clay, which goes down to tide-level. The pits across the road, and south of the main bank, furnish a light-colored clay, which burns to a paler shade. The bluish and the black clays of the main bank make a deep-colored red brick. The clay at the bottom is at the same height of the Woodbridge fire-clay bed, and from its character and elevation may be regarded as part of it. Nothing definite is known of its thickness or of its character, except what has been learned from the surface specimens. The clays worked in these banks all belong to the laminated clay and sand beds, the source of nearly all of the best red brick clays dug in the State. In the old bank south of the kilns a black, pyritiferous and lignitic clay is seen.

The clay bank of the Newark Company is at the side of the New Brunswick road, close to and north-east of the village of Washington. The excavation has been confined within the ten and thirty feet contour lines above tide-level, corresponding to the heights at Pettit's bank, and the clays dug here are geologically the same as those at the latter place. This bank belongs to the same bed as the brick-clay bank of Sayre & Fisher, in Sayreville, and it has not been more worked for several years past. Northwest of this bank kaolin and a clayey sand crop out in the hill on the North Brunswick road. The top of this outcrop is eighty-five to ninety feet above high-water mark. The height is the same as that of the kaolin, which is worked on the Whitehead estate, southwest of the village of Washington, but it is one-third of a mile north of that locality, and consequently does not show any dip in the bed, corresponding more with the elevations of the bed as opened north of the Raritan, and showing the Whitehead bank to be exceptionally high.

The Whitehead kaolin bank is in the village of Washington, at the side of the Hardenburgh Corners road, near the top of the hill. It is covered by a reddish sandy gravel, which is thicker westward in the higher ground. In the excavation for road material, this gravel appears in layers of irregular extent and thickness, with thicker strata of coarse sand. The kaolin (surface) has an elevation of eighty-two feet above mean high-water level, and the workable bed averages six feet in thickness. Under it there is a fine white sand, and then the black clay of the brick-clay bank. This kaolin is very white and rather coarse-grained, contains more white mica than is commonly found in the kaolins of other localities in this district, and is not regarded as a first class article. According to a partial analysis it is composed as follows: Alumina and sesquioxide of iron, 7.80 per cent.; silicic acid and sand, 89.40 per cent.; water, 2.60 per cent.; total (determined), 99.80 per cent.

As the stripping is light and the drainage easy, this bank is cheaply worked.

The brick-clay bank of Willett & Yates is almost connected with the above-described kaolin bank, being a few yards southeast of the latter, in the village of Washington. The strata between the top of this bank (fifty-nine feet elevation) and the bottom of the kaolin (seventy-six feet) are not seen, excepting in the gentle slope of hill, and as to these there is some uncertainty. The several subdivisions of the bank and their relation to the kaolin are expressed in the following order, beginning at the top of the hill at the gravel-pit:

(1) Reddish sand and gravel, 10 to 15 feet; (2) kaolin, workable bed, 6 feet; (3) black clay, with layers of sand partially obscured, 35 feet; (4) yellow, loamy clay, 1½ feet; (5) black pyritiferous clay, 6 feet; (6) bluish, clayey kaolin, 4 feet; (7) slate-colored clay, 5 feet; (8) clay full of pyrite, 1½ feet; (9) bluish kaolin, 1 foot.

Blue clay is at the bottom of the digging, which is 22 feet above the level of the water. No. 3 occupies the interval between the kaolin near the top of the hill and the top of the working face of the clay bank. In No. 8 there is very much of both lignite and pyrite, and it is sometimes called pyrites' clay. Layers 6 and 9 are sands which are known in the bank as kaolins. They are mixed with the clays for bricks. No. 7 is very tenacious, burns hard, is quite refractory, and free from pyrite, and is considered the best clay in the bank. The working face of the bank stops at the bottom of this, although in the drains and in the eastern part of the bank, nearer the yards, lower clays have been dug; the several clays and sands are mixed together in using them for the brick.

James Bissett's clay bank is on the west bank of South River, one mile southeast of Washington. There is here at the top yellow sand and gravel 8 feet thick, then a grayish clay 1 foot thick, then a kaolin-like sand, which is about 8 feet thick. Then comes the black clay, thick layers of which alternate with very thin seams of white sand and sandy clay. This is a very solid, tenacious clay, has a specific gravity of 1.778 to 1.812, and is superior for brick. The height of the black clay outcrop is 22 feet above high-tide level, and the bottom of the digging is 10 feet below the same plane. At the bottom the clay is more sandy. It burns very red. The materials of the several layers are generally mixed together, and all put into common red brick. At the top there is over the black clay and the kaolin a grayish streak of clayey sand, which is said to be hard to burn. Neither the top clay nor the kaolin over the black clay are used. Mr. Bissett found a whitish clay in a pit and boring about 100 yards west of his residence, at a depth of 22 feet beneath the surface, in ground 40 feet high; consequently this clay was nearly 20 feet above high-water level.

About twenty years ago 3000 tons, perhaps, of potter's clay was dug near Old Bridge, in the Snake Hill, and at the tide-level, by Andrew J. Disbrow. As worked the bed was 8 feet thick, and was underlain by sand. There was about 25 feet of top dirt over it. The clay was of a greenish slate color. An analysis of a specimen gave the following percentages:

Alumina, 19.85; silicic acid, 24.55; water (combined), 5.70; sand (quartz), 44.80; titanic acid, 1.00;

potash, 1.90; soda, 9.32; sesquioxide of iron, 1.00; water (moisture), .90. Total, 100.02.

These figures indicate a composition suitable for pottery, corresponding as they do quite closely with the stoneware clays of this district. This outcrop, from its elevation, appears too low for the stoneware clay, unless there is a curve in the line of strike of that bed, which is not sustained by any other fact; hence it seems more reasonable to regard this clay as part of the South Amboy fire-clay bed, though in composition and character it is allied to the stoneware clays.

Higher up in the side of Snake Hill, and 50 feet above tide-water level, there is another layer of light-colored sandy clay. It has not been worked, and none of it has been examined.

Northwest of this, and nearer the New Brunswick road, on the same property, clay has been dug in two small openings at intervals during the past forty years. These pits are about 100 feet above the level of the tide. This clay has been used in making drain-pipe. Specimens from near the surface of the ground are drab-colored, sandy, and streaked with yellow earth. The same clay has been struck, as is supposed, in several wells on the high ground in this neighborhood.

Potter's clay at the river-level is seen in the bank up the stream, in the village of Old Bridge, where it is two feet thick. It is thought it can be traced to the southwest as far as Outcalt's mills, above Spottswood.

With the trade in sand and clays, brick-making and pottery are closely allied. Both of these branches of industry have been extensively plied in East Brunswick.

BRICK-MAKING.—At Washington and in its vicinity a very extensive business has been done for some time past in the manufacture of common hard brick. Immense quantities of brick are shipped from Washington annually.

John Griggs established the first yard a little later than 1850, which he operated about nine years. After a period of inactivity the premises were owned successively by Messrs. Johnson and Servison, finally passing into the possession of the present owner, W. S. Pettit.

Wynant Griggs began to manufacture brick just previous to 1860, selling out after a time to William Wright. This brick-yard has several times changed hands, now being known as Price's.

The Washington Brick and Clay Company was incorporated in 1869. The brick-yard is connected with Willett's dock by a horse railroad about three-eighths of a mile in length, by means of which the brick are conveyed to navigation. The area of the yard is nearly three acres. The Yates brick-yard adjoining is an enterprise of more recent date.

In 1869 the East Brunswick Brick Company was organized by Messrs. James Bissett, William De Voë, Jacob F. Rue, and Charles H. Bissett. William De Voë retired from the business in 1870 and Jacob F. Rue and Charles H. Bissett in 1875, since which time it has been managed by James Bissett.

POTTERIES.—Some time after the Revolution a pottery was started at Old Bridge by Gen. James Morgan and Jacob Van Wickle, which was in operation till about 1828. The building they had used went to ruin, and was torn down about 1840. About 1815 some of the Bissetts established a pottery on the wharf at Old Bridge, which was in existence as such until about 1830.

Jacob Eaton and Samuel Stout had a pottery at Washington about 1825–45, where the residence of John Jacob Bissett now is.

About 1840–60, Samuel Whitehead was extensively engaged in the manufacture of white and stoneware in a building on Jackson Street, Washington, which was erected by him as a pottery, and is still standing.

THE WOOD TRADE.—Formerly there was an extensive trade carried on in this township in lumber and wood, the latter being by far the larger of the two. Under the impulse given to local business by this trade the villages of Washington and Old Bridge grew considerably until it began to flag and land in all directions was cleared and fitted for cultivation. It also furnished employment to many watermen, who made these two villages their headquarters.

MISCELLANEOUS MANUFACTURES.—In 1823, Robison Thomas was making paint in Washington within the present limits of Theodore Willett's brick-yard.

A tannery was built at Spottswood about 1808 by Matthias Prest. It was not successful, and was abandoned after a few years. George Lane had a tannery and shoe-factory there from about 1833 to about 1853, and for some years later manufactured a limited quantity of shoes.

At Old Bridge one of the Van Wickles managed a fanning-mill manufactory, 1835–40 or thereabouts. Another was established about the latter date by Leonard Appleby and James C. Stout, and continued until about 1850.

On the site of the Railroad Mills, near Spottswood, John Browne started a distillery about 1806, and conducted it as such about twelve years. About 1818 it was converted into a snuff-mill.

James C. Stout began distilling apple brandy and whisky at Old Bridge about 1835, and did quite an extensive business until his death in February, 1878. His son, S. W. Stout, succeeded him, making apple brandy only, the amount of his business depending on the plentitude of the apple crop. This industry has created a market at Old Bridge for apples, which are hauled in in their season by the farmers for several miles around. John H. Disbrough for some time previous and subsequent to 1835 had a distillery at Spottswood.

For a few years past a fruit-canning factory has been in operation on Crommelin's Creek.

About 1875, William Dill converted his snuff-factory at Old Bridge into a saw-mill, which is still in existence and at times in operation.

The hominy-mills of John Outcalt were established on the historical mill-site of Weechqueechley, the half-breed Indian, in 1870, the snuff-mill, in the management of which he had succeeded his father, John D. Outcalt, being remodeled to adapt it to the present enterprise, which occupies three two-story buildings and affords employment to seven hands. About one hundred and four thousand bushels of corn are consumed in this mill annually, most of which is brought from Monmouth County. The hominy is put up in five- and ten-pound packages and shipped to New York, Philadelphia, and Boston.

Gilbert Brown started the first and only manufactory of clothing at Old Bridge in 1872. The materials are cut and the garments trimmed in New York. Twenty hands are kept busy in Brown's factory making the garments, and a business which averages six thousand dollars annually is done.

Feb. 1, 1879, V. Henry Rothschild established a shirt-factory at Spottswood in a building formerly occupied as a snuff and tobacco-factory. During the busy season about one hundred hands are employed, and fifty-one No. 8 and forty-one No. 2 sewing-machines are operated. The average output is five hundred dozen shirts per week, which are shipped to Mr. Rothschild's New York house, at the corner of West Broadway and Leonard Street. The factory is superintended by Mr. Leonard Appleby.

There is also a shirt-factory at Washington, in a building which was some years ago occupied as a carpet- and rug-factory.

Churches.—ST. PETER'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SPOTTSWOOD.—From a brief account of the early history of this church, compiled from various sources by Rev. John M. Ward, sometime rector, it appears that about thirty residents, mainly settlers from Staten Island, who were descendants of members of the Church of England, had collected materials and raised the first building in 1757, but it was not fit for use until 1759, the first service therein being held by Rev. Mr. Skinner, missionary at Amboy.

There is reason to believe that services were held at intervals some time before the church was built, as the Rev. Mr. Skinner wrote in 1747, "My circuit is from Amboy to South River, thence to Piscataway, and thence to Amboy." In another letter he mentions crossing the river "two miles" wide, and thence over a sandy road "twelve miles" to South River. This agrees quite well with the distance by the old road to Spottswood, and there was no settlement of any note nearer Amboy.¹

After this time Rev. Mr. McKean, a missionary at

New Brunswick, officiated part of his time, 1760–62. The communicants then numbered twelve. In April, 1768, Rev. William Ayres was appointed missionary by the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel" to the churches at Spottswood and Freehold. This report of the first year shows that he baptized twenty-two children and four adults. In 1787 he was elected rector and removed from his former residence on the glebe, located between the two churches, to Spottswood (bringing with him a small but valuable library from England), and there resided until 1799.

During his ministry (Nov. 23, 1773) a charter for the church was granted by William Franklin, the last royal Governor of New Jersey. In the words of the charter, the corporators beside Rev. Mr. Ayres were "Right Hon. David Carnagie, commonly called Lord Rosehill, John Lewis Johnston, Frederic Bucklew, John Rue, Thomas Newton, John Barclay, Jr., Joseph Perrine, James Rue, David Stout, Samuel Neilson, Richard Lott, James Abraham, and John Perrine, all freeholders and inhabitants of the town of Spottswood, within the South Ward of the city of Perth Amboy, in the County of Middlesex." The first wardens, as named in the charter, were Lord Rosehill and John Lewis Johnston, the other laymen corporators being designated as vestrymen.

Mr. Ayres resigned in 1799 and removed to Virginia. The next rector was Rev. Andrew Fowler, who remained but fifteen months, after which the services of Rev. Mr. Cotton from New Brunswick were obtained at intervals for a short period.

Beginning in 1802, Rev. John Croes (afterwards bishop), of New Brunswick, officiated "half his time" till 1803, when he became rector, remaining till 1809, when impaired health induced him to resign.

Until 1822 there was no settled minister and there were but occasional services. In 1816 the church was finished, having been before this time merely inclosed with shingles. The Rev. John M. Ward took charge in 1822, and in 1824 became rector. He resigned in 1835, and was for many years rector at Mamaroneck, N. Y., but eventually, on account of impaired health, resigned and returned, residing at his former home until his death. There are some yet living who regard his cheerful and genial nature with affectionate remembrance.

In 1836, Rev. John Jones officiated a short time. Rev. Thomas Tauser was in charge one year, in 1837 and 1838. He was succeeded by Rev. Robert B. Croes (son of the bishop), who was rector 1838–40. In 1842 Rev. Isaac Smith took charge as rector and resigned in 1847, removing to Piscataway. Rev. Joseph F. Phillips succeeded the same year and resigned in 1858. During the ministry of Rev. Mr. Phillips, in 1850–51, the old church was taken down and the present one built on the same site and completed so far as to have services held in it. The church is of wood, and in style it partakes of the perpendicular Gothic, being from designs of Frank

Wills, then recently from England and a very prominent architect. The chief builder was Samuel B. Leonard. The style, location, and surroundings combined, in summer especially, are strikingly beautiful. The church was consecrated by Bishop Doane on Oct. 21, 1854.

Rev. Thomas Lyle was rector from 1858 to 1864, and Rev. John Stearns, M.D., a short time in 1864, dying in that year. His mortal part with that of Rev. Mr. Ward are resting in the shadow of the church.

Rev. Kinsey J. Stewart was rector from 1865 to 1868, and later Rev. George Crowe a short time until his death. Rev. Dr. Southard Compton served the church in 1869 and 1870, and Rev. Frederic M. Bird from 1870 to 1874. During his ministry the present parsonage was built. Rev. Lorenzo S. Russell came in 1874 and remained until 1880, when he resigned and removed to Long Island. In April, 1881, Rev. Charles M. Parkman, B.D., took charge as rector.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY AT WASHINGTON.—In 1866 an Episcopal Church was organized in the present township of Sayreville, opposite Washington, under the ministrations of Rev. Gideon J. Burton, then rector of Christ Church at South Amboy. The corner-stone of the Holy Trinity Chapel was laid by Rev. Mr. Burton Jan. 12, 1860, and he held the first service in the new church on the 14th of the following April. The building was consecrated by Right Rev. Bishop Odenheimer on Whit-Sunday of the year 1861. The sum of $1000, nearly the whole amount necessary for its erection, was given by Miss Sophia Conover, then of South Amboy. The lot on which the church stood was donated by William Van Deventer. In the summer of 1876, at the suggestion of Rev. Mr. Burton and with the consent of those who were parties to its erection and of the ecclesiastical authorities of the diocese, the church edifice was taken down and removed to the village of Washington, Mr. Daniel B. Martin presenting a lot upon which to rebuild it and bearing the expense of its removal. He also had it somewhat enlarged and improved in its reconstruction, and contributed largely towards its being comfortably furnished and fitted up. The bishop of the diocese decided that it would not be necessary to rededicate the building. The first service held in it after its removal and before it was completed was the funeral of its generous benefactor, Daniel B. Martin.¹

¹ Daniel B. Martin was born at Perth Amboy in 1813. When about ten years old he attracted the attention of William Shepard, then engineer of the steamer "New York" (the first that ran to Washington of the Citizens' Line), and was made greaser on that vessel, and in 1825 became fireman. When the Citizens' Line ceased to run the "New York" became the property of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and Robert L. Stevens, president of that company, made Martin his engineer. In 1846, through the influence of Mr. Stevens, he was made chief engineer of the United States steamer "Mississippi," which did active service in the Mexican war. In 1850 Mr. Stevens

The first regular service in the reconstructed edifice was performed by Rev. Messrs. Burton and Jaques, the former preaching and the latter reading the service. Previous to this time monthly Episcopal services had been held in the village in the public school-house by Rev. Joseph F. Phillips during his connection as rector with St. Peter's Church, Spottswood (1847-58), and later more frequently in Mrs. O. M. Poale's residence by Rev. James H. Smith, assistant rector of the parish of South Amboy. Under Rev. Mr. Burton's direction, Rev. G. H. Williams held regular services in the church in 1866 and 1867, leaving in September of the latter year. From that time until October, 1868, occasional services were held by Revs. P. L. Jaques and Gideon J. Burton. At the date mentioned Rev. William Homman began to labor in Washington as a missionary by appointment of the bishop, there being as yet no parochial organization. He has been succeeded by Rev. Frederic M. Bird, who served the church 1870-74; Rev. Lorenzo S. Russell, 1874-80, and Rev. Charles M. Parkinson, B.D., who began his labors in April, 1881, all rectors of St. Peter's Church, Spottswood.

The records show that there were eleven baptisms of children from Feb. 2, 1869, to May 7, 1876, and eight of adults from May 21, 1871, to March 1, 1876; eleven confirmations from April 19, 1869, to Oct. 25, 1874; five marriages from Oct. 2, 1869, to Nov. 6, 1874, and eleven burials from Jan. 29, 1862, to Oct. 31, 1878. A Sunday-school was organized in 1866 with fifty members. The first superintendent was Rev. G. H. Williams; the present one is Charles Hall. The library contains two hundred volumes.

THE OLD BAPTIST CHURCH OF WASHINGTON.—By some of the oldest living members this church is thought to have been organized previous to 1800, but the records contain no entries of an earlier date than 1805. During that year the following list was written in the record book of the "constituent members," so designated:

secured him the appointment as chief engineer of the steamer "Pacific," of the Collins Line of European steamers. For valuable service rendered the Collins Steamship Company he was made the recipient of a handsome silver pitcher bearing the following inscription: "D. B. Martin, chief engineer of the United States Mail Steamer 'Pacific,' Ezra Nye, commander. Presented by Edw. K. Collins for his skill in the performance of and assiduity to his duties, which aided much in achieving for America the credit of the first passage between Liverpool and New York under ten days. New York, April, 1851." In 1851 Mr. Martin was appointed engineer-in-chief of the United States navy, and served four years, in the mean time patenting for the government a boiler called the "hood" boiler, which, in consideration of its economy and the small space it occupies, is regarded as the best boiler ever invented for steamboat use. During the Rebellion he was appointed by the Secretary of War to visit England to examine ironclad steamers and report upon their merits and adaptability to the needs of the government. He was also commissioned to inspect certain river steamers and decide upon their availability for the government service. He made his home in Washington from 1842 until his death, living retired since the close of the late war, taking a lively interest in religious and educational affairs, and doing much substantial good for both churches and schools.

The following are the names of the successive pastors of this church, with the dates at which they began their pastorates, so far as they can be ascertained :

Revs. Peter Wilson (was preaching to the congregation in 1805, and perhaps considerably earlier), Jenkin Davis (supply), John Segar (supply), Augustus Elliot, 1824; James C. Goble, 1824; William Clark, 1837 (the church having been without a pastor since 1826); James C. Goble, 1839; John Jones, 1840; Wilson Housel, 1844 (there having been no pastor since 1842); William Curtis, 1850; James C. Goble, 1851; David Flandro, 1861; Wilson Housel, 1862 (pastor to the present time).

The first trustees mentioned in the records (1805) were as follows : Charles Gilmore, Joseph Cheeseman, Jacob Stults, Samuel Pitney, Stephen Barkelew, Samuel Willet, and Peter Obert.

The trustees in 1881 were the following : Henry Stults, Frederick Stults, Richard Serviss, Jacob F. Rue, S. T. Christian, and George W. Peterson.

The present membership is eighteen. The church is located on Main Street, nearly in the centre of the village, and has been built many years. It is a frame building, and the oldest church in the village.

THE TABERNACLE BAPTIST CHURCH OF WASHINGTON.—The early history of this church is so recent as to belong to the modern period of the township's history. A company of Baptists, small in number but true to their distinctive principles, having long felt the necessity of erecting at Washington a church of their own faith, met at the house of Ezekiel Wade, in that village, on the evening of Nov. 15, 1870, to consider the propriety of erecting a Baptist Church in the village.

The following-named individuals were present: Samuel C. Ballard, Furman Smith and wife, Ezekiel Wade and wife, Charles Henderson and wife, Miss Emily Willett, Miss Louisa Willett, Mrs. Harriet Willett, Mrs. Elvira Culver, and Benjamin Ballard. After a prayer was offered by Ezekiel Wade, Samuel C. Ballard was chosen chairman, and Ezekiel Wade secretary of the meeting. After a discussion of the purpose which had called them together, those assembled decided to take steps towards the erection of a church.

A building committee was appointed, consisting of Ezekiel Wade, Benjamin Ballard, and Samuel C. Ballard. It was decided to erect a building twenty-three by thirty-two feet, and six hundred and fifteen dollars were subscribed by those present to be devoted to that purpose, and a building lot was donated by Samuel Whitehead.

The church was completed and dedicated Sunday, May 3, 1871, the dedicatory sermon being preached by Rev. John Dowling, D.D., of New York. On the evening of the same day Dr. Devan preached an impressive sermon, after which subscriptions to the amount of seven hundred and five dollars were received.

On Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, 1871, after the usual services, a business meeting was held, when a formal organization was effected, under the title of the Tabernacle Baptist Church, of which Ezekiel Wade was elected clerk. The members present all signed the articles of faith, as follows : Mrs. Harriet Willett, Miss Emily Willett, Miss Louisa Willett, William H. De Voe, Jesse Heustis, Elizabeth A. Heustis, Sarah Cox, Mrs. E. E. Simmons, Matilda Wilmurt, Sarah DeVoe, Ezekiel Wade, Susan Wade, and Mary A. Rue.

Wednesday evening, Nov. 29, 1871, a council was called to publicly recognize the new organization as a regularly constituted Baptist Church. Eleven churches were invited to send pastors and delegates. After the usual formalities the council by a unanimous vote declared the organization in harmony with the faith and practice of the Baptist denomination, and at the yearly convention in October, 1872, the church was received into the Central Baptist Convention.

From this time until the settlement of the first pastor the pulpit was very ably supplied by Dr. Devan, of New Brunswick. Sept. 29, 1872, a unanimous call was extended by the church to Rev. Matthew Johnson to become their pastor, which was accepted at once. During the ministry of Mr. Johnson twenty-three were added to the numerical strength of the church, and on the last Sunday in June, 1874, he preached his farewell sermon to a large and regretful congregation, after a pastorate of one year and nine months, removing to Trenton, N. J., to assume charge of the Calvary Baptist Church of that city. The church was without a pastor during nearly two years following, but the pulpit was supplied by Mr. J. B. L'Hommedieu, then a student in the Hightstown Baptist Institute. Nov. 1, 1875, Rev. H. D. Doolittle, of Putney, N. Y., was called to the pastorate, and served the church until he resigned the pastoral charge in August, 1878. During his pastorate nine were added to the membership of the church by letter or baptism. During a year and a half succeeding Mr. Doolittle's departure the pulpit was supplied by students from Crozer Theological Seminary of Chester, Pa. On the first Sunday in January, 1880, a call was extended by the church to Rev. C. H. Woolston, who accepted it, and soon entered upon his duties as pastor. He inaugurated a revival of religion, which, with his other efforts to the present time, resulted in adding thirty-eight members to the church by baptism and eight by letter. The membership in 1881 was eighty-three.

The Sunday-school connected with Tabernacle Church dates back nearly to the organization of that body. The number of original scholars was eight. Ezekiel Wade was the first superintendent. Succeeding ones have been Rev. H. D. Doolittle, David Wade, Edwin Farmer, Jesse Heustis, Oliver Cox, and Rev. C. H. Woolston, the present incumbent of the office. The membership in December, 1881, was eighty, exclusive of fourteen officers and teachers, and is larger than that of any other Sunday-school in Little Washington. The Tabernacle Times, a small local newspaper devoted especially to the Tabernacle Sunday-school and Church, has been issued during the past year under the auspices of the Sunday-school, edited by Rev. C. H. Woolston. The Sunday-school library contains more than three hundred volumes.

In July, 1881, alterations were made in the church edifice, and services to commemorate its completion were held in the Tabernacle Sunday afternoon, August 28th, at which the following clergymen were present: Revs. H. F. Smith, D.D., Dr. Devan, and Joseph Horner, of New Brunswick, O. P. Eaches, of Hightstown, and T. E. Sleeper, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church of South River. Tabernacle Church is one of the notable buildings of Washington, and it is probable that the average congregations which convene within its walls are as large as have been called out at any time in the history of the village.

THE INDEPENDENT BETHEL BAPTIST CHURCH.—The house of worship of this church is located on Willow Street, in the village of Old Bridge, and is a frame building, thirty-six by forty feet, with a steeple and bell, and with the other church property is valued at two thousand five hundred dollars. It was completed in 1844 by Samuel Sproul, a Baptist preacher, who was also a carpenter and builder, and who did the work under contract with the officers of the Independent Bethel Baptist Church of Herbertsville and Washington.

This church was organized Oct. 2, 1840, with thirteen members, as follows: John Jones, Jonathan Boraem, Paul Van Arsdale, James Van Arsdale, Enos Van Pelt, Elizabeth Van Arsdale, Cornelius Homans, Cornelia Van Arsdale, Cortland Disbrow, D. C. Van Arsdale, William Tracy, R. Van Arsdale, and Mary Jones. Rev. John Jones, the first mentioned of these constituent members, was the first pastor of the church, and it was under his ministrations that the organization was effected.

The succeeding pastors with their terms of service were Revs. John B. Case, one year; Samuel Sproul, six years; Lewis Stelle, three years; Jacob Gesner, one year; J. C. Salisbury, two years; John Davis, two years; H. H. Rouse, thirteen years; Henry Shipe, one year; Charles P. De Camp, one year; and Jacob Janun, one year. The church has at times been without a pastor, and has had none since the departure of Rev. Jacob Janun in 1877. Between the close of the pastorate of Rev. Jacob Gesner and the beginning of that of Rev. J. C. Salisbury there was an interval of six years, during a portion of which period, and often since the close of the pastorate of Rev. Jacob Janun, the pulpit has been supplied by students from theological schools and such Baptist clergymen as have from time to time visited the village.

The church was recognized in 1844 by a council composed of T. I. Snedeker, of Hydestown, J. M. Carpenter and J. Van Brakle, of Jacksonville, P. P. Ryan, of New Brunswick, and C. W. Mulford, D. Prest, and Samuel Sproum.

The present trustees are John Montgomery, John D. Reed, Ephraim Van Arsdale, John S. Slover, and Henry Appleby, the latter of whom is clerk.

The Sunday-school connected with Bethel Church was organized in 1863 with fifty scholars, under the superintendency of E. Wade. He has been succeeded in the order named by Rev. H. H. Rouse, Gilbert Brown, and William M. Appleby, the present superintendent.

The library contains about 250 volumes.

WASHINGTON METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—When and by whom the first service according to the usages of the Methodist Episcopal Church was held at Washington are alike unknown to any inhabitant of the township. The first Methodist meeting of which any knowledge is extant as having been held in the vicinity was held in the old district school-house, yet standing near the old Baptist Church, by Rev. Charles S. Downs, about thirty-five years ago. Meetings were held regularly in the old school-house during the succeeding three years, during which Mr. Downs by a year's labors gathered the nucleus of the present church organization, and was succeeded by Rev. Samuel Jaquette, who remained two years, strengthening the bonds which held the struggling congregation together, and preparing the way for the more conspicuous labors of his successors.

At the expiration of three years the congregation was yet so small that it was deemed best to hold the meetings in the houses of some of the most ardent members rather than go to the trouble of heating the school-house in the winter and otherwise providing for services as they had theretofore been conducted. In the mean time measures were adopted looking to the erection of a permanent house of worship. A lot was purchased on the principal street of the village, since known as Main Street, and a small church was built thereon, which now serves, having been altered for such use, as a parsonage belonging to the present organization. This building was dedicated and occupied about 1850, Rev. Stacy Howland being the regular preacher at that time, remaining two years as pastor of the church. He was followed by Rev. Joseph Horner, who served the church two years, during which the South River appointment was a mission charge.

The preachers who have since then ministered to this church have been regularly stationed on the South River charge. Their names and terms of service have been as follows, in the order named: Rev. John H. Stockton, two years; Rev. Robert Sutcliffe, two years; Rev. Thomas S. Wilson, two years; Rev. Joseph Atwood, one year; Rev. David McCurdy, two years; Rev. James W. McDougall, two years; Rev. W. W. Christine, two years; Rev. Samuel F. Wheeler, two years; Rev. L. J. Rhoads, one year; Rev. John I. Corson, two years; Rev. William Franklin, three years; Rev. Samuel M. Stone, two years; Rev. Edward Lippincott, one year; Rev. George Collins, who died in the middle of his second year, the vacancy for the ensuing six months having been filled by Rev. Joseph Horner; Rev. T. D. Sleeper, the present pastor, who has served the church since the spring of 1880.

The constituent members of this church at its organization, about 1846, were James Peterson, Henry Gordon, George Norman, Peter Smith, Z. Van Deventer, John Slover, John R. Reed, Margaret Norman, and others. About 1857 or 1858 the membership had so increased that it was apparent the little church edifice would soon have to be enlarged or a larger one built in its stead, and Mrs. Nancy Conklin, a prominent member, volunteered to contribute one thousand dollars towards a fund to be expended in either of the above-mentioned ways that might seem most desirable to a majority of the members, and at a subsequent meeting of the board of trustees it was decided to erect a new church, which was completed and dedicated with appropriate religious ceremonies in 1859. This structure, which is still standing on Main Street and in use, is one of the most sightly buildings in Little Washington borough, and cost five thousand eight hundred dollars, including a second donation by Mrs. Conklin of one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five dollars.

The trustees under whose management the present church was erected were Messrs. James Peterson, Henry Gordon, George Norman, and William D. Serviss.

In 1881 the official board was constituted as follows: Trustees, Charles Serviss, Conover Bowne, Edward Barkelew, J. J. Kleine, and William French; Stewards, Theodore Irons, George Serviss, James Peterson, J. J. Kleine, Conover Bowne, Charles Serviss, and Daniel Morgan.

The Beacon-Light Sunday-school, under the auspices of this church, was organized about 1848, with one hundred and fourteen members. The sessions were held in John R. Reid's store until the completion of the church. The following have been the superintendents: William D. Serviss, P. B. Smith, R. V. D. Reed, Z. Van Deventer, O. Gordon, E. Booraem, William Smith, A. Sperling, William H. Peterson, and Rev. T. D. Sleeper. The present membership is one hundred. The library contains two hundred volumes.

THE SIMPSON METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF OLD BRIDGE.—Methodist services were not held at Old Bridge at a very early date, though for a considerable time before the organization of the church above mentioned preaching was heard by the few Methodists there with more or less frequency from circuit preachers in the old district school-house, and at length a class was formed, which for a time was connected with the South River Methodist Episcopal Church, and became the basis of the present society.

Simpson Methodist Episcopal Church, so named in honor of Bishop Simpson, the very prominent historian of his religious denomination, was organized in 1860. The following were among its most prominent constituent members: Benjamin D. Brown, J. H. Bloodgood, William Rogers, Mrs. Jane Bloodgood, Mrs. Adeline Rogers, Susan Brown, Mrs. Sarah Gregory, Henry P. Hoffman, Mrs. Jane Hoffman, and L. E. Collins.

The church edifice, a wooden building about thirty-two by fifty feet, with a steeple and bell, was erected in 1860 at a cost of $2000.

The successive pastors of this church have been Revs. William Eakins, E. M. Garton, Frank Mundy, William H. Lawrence, J. W. Clark, John Handley, J. Bradshaw, and L. B. Edwards, in charge in 1881.

The present membership of the Simpson Church is about fifty.

The board of trustees is composed of William Rogers, president; J. H. Bloodgood, B. D. Brown, Lawrence Collins, Charles Brown, and E. F. Brown. The stewards are J. H. Bloodgood, B. D. Brown, Lawrence Collins, E. F. Brown, and J. W. Davidson.

A Sunday-school was organized in 1860, which has since had an uninterrupted existence. The first superintendent was J. H. Bloodgood. Rev. L. B. Edwards is the present superintendent. The membership of the school, including officers and trustees, is forty-five. The library contains about one hundred volumes.

SPOTTSWOOD METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—If there was ever a Methodist meeting held at Spottswood previous to 1873 it was at a period so remote as to be beyond the knowledge of any persons of that denomination at this time resident there. In the spring of the year mentioned Rev. Frank Mundy, at that time pastor of the Simpson Methodist Episcopal Church at Old Bridge, held a series of meetings in the ball-room of one of the hotels in the village, which resulted in the conversion of a goodly number to Christianity, and led to a desire on the part of many of the converts for the establishment of regular Methodist worship in their midst. Before the close of the year a church was organized, and preparations were begun for the erection of a house of worship.

A church was completed and dedicated in 1874. It is a wooden building large enough for the accommodation of the congregation, and with the lot on which it stands and such other property as the organization possesses is valued at about $1500.

This church has a membership of twenty-five or thirty, and the Sunday-school connected with it (also organized in 1873) a membership of thirty, and a library of about seventy-five volumes, its teachers and officers numbering five. The present trustees are David White, John Bowers, Thomas Matthews, Merrill Mundy, and William Rogers. The stewards are William Petty, Charles Campbell, and Mrs. John Vliet.

Rev. Frank Mundy, William H. Lawrence, J. W. Clark, John Handley, J. Bradshaw, and L. B. Edwards, the present pastor, have successively served this church as pastor.

THE REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH OF SPOTTSWOOD.—The Board of Missions of the Reformed Dutch Church having located a missionary at Spottswood in the hope of ultimately supplying a large portion of the population of that village and its vicinity with the stated preaching of the gospel and the administration of its ordinances according to the usages of that denomination, and a goodly number of the inhabitants cordially seconding the designs of the board that a church should be organized in their midst, an application was made to Rev. John Ludlow to effect the desired organization. In compliance with this application, Rev. Mr. Ludlow formally organized a church Aug. 5, 1821, with the following-named members: Jacob R. Hardenbergh, Cornelius Johnson, Joseph Gulick, Daniel Dean, and Jonathan Combs, Jr.

The following officers were elected: Elders, Jacob R. Hardenbergh and Cornelius Johnson; Deacons, Joseph Gulick, Cornelius Johnson, and Jonathan Combs, Jr.

Following are the names of the successive pastors, with the date at which each began his labors: Revs. John McClure, 1821; Henry L. Rice, 1825; John C. Van Liew, 1834; William R. Betts, 1842; William Knight, 1845; John H. Manning, 1847; A. Vandewater, 1854; Ralph Willis, 1868; Stephen J. Harmeling, 1881.

The first house of worship of this church was on Main Street. It was a small building, erected by subscription, and was dedicated Aug. 21, 1821, by Rev. John H. Livingston, D.D. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. Philip Milledoller, D.D., of New York, the text being 2 Chronicles, vi. 18: "But will God in very deed dwell with men on the earth? Behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee: how much less this house which I have built." The concluding prayer was made by Rev. Samuel B. House, of the Presbyterian Church.

This church served the congregation forty-five years, when it had become so numerous as to require a larger house of worship, and in 1866 the old church was torn down and the present one built on the same site. It is a frame structure, measuring forty by sixty-three feet, with a slate roof, surmounted by a steeple seventy-six feet high, which contains a bell costing three hundred dollars. The building is heated by a furnace in the basement, and is carpeted and cushioned throughout. It was completed and furnished at an expense of six thousand dollars. The parsonage, which stands on the church lot, cost three thousand dollars.

The present membership of this church is eighty. The officers are as follows: Elders, Henry Van Dyke, Joseph Johnson, H. Smith, and Thomas Smith; Deacons, Benjamin Conover and Isaac Perdue; Treasurer, Lewis E. Skinner; Secretary, Robert Frishmuth.

The Sunday-school was organized early in the history of the church, and has had a continuous existence to the present. Rev. Stephen J. Harmeling is the superintendent. The membership is sixty. The library contains one hundred volumes.

THE MILLTOWN GERMAN REFORMED (ST. PAUL'S) CHURCH.—During a short time previous to 1872 those of the German Reformed faith at Milltown met Sunday afternoons in the Methodist Episcopal Church, different clergymen of the denomination preaching as circumstances favored. During that year St. Paul's Church was organized and a house of worship built at a cost of about four thousand five hundred dollars, located something less than a quarter of a mile from Lawrence's Brook, in that portion of the village lying in the township of East Brunswick. It was dedicated by Rev. Charles Banks in 1872.

Rev. Mr. Banks was the first regular pastor of the church, and remained in that capacity two years, when, in 1874, he was succeeded by Rev. G. B. Chick, who has served the church uninterruptedly since that date.

In 1873 the Sunday-school connected with this church was organized, with F. Gerhart as superintendent. The present superintendent is Rev. G. B. Chick. The school has a membership of one hundred, and a library of two hundred volumes.

Burial-Places.—It is probable that the earliest interments in the township were made in private burying-grounds on the farms of the early residents. Many of these are supposed to have contained not more than one or two graves, and to have disappeared long since in consequence of changes made about their localities by subsequent owners of the property.

In a small burying-ground, where no graves have been made for years, near the Summer Hill School-house, in School District No. 32, a number of the Obert family are buried.

On the farm now owned by James Bissett, on the lower road from Washington to Old Bridge, the early residence of the Barkelew family, are a number of old graves, in which lie the remains of some of the earlier generations of Barkeleyws. From headstones in this burying-ground the following names of deceased persons, with the dates of their deaths, have been copied :

Anne Sherer, wife of Gilbert Sherer, Sept. 21, 1791; Elizabeth, wife of Stephen Barkeley, Dec. 18, 1801; Ann Barkeley, wife of Abraham Barkeley, July 20, 1807; Stephen Barkeley, March 26, 1808; Abraham Barkeley, March 18, 1814; Isaac Barkeley, Jan. 8, 1814; Abraham S. Barkeley, July 5, 1818. On another portion of the old Barkeley farm is a burial-ground containing the remains of a goodly number of slaves who died on the place many years since.

There is a private burying-ground on the Furman Smith farm, where are some graves said to have been made as much as a century ago. Here are buried members of the families of Cheeseman, Perdun, and Smith.

There are some old gravestones in the churchyard of St. Peter's Episcopal Church at Spottswood, the records on which are scarcely legible, but challenge the attention and reflection of the observer. From some of these the writer has copied the following names with dates of death : Peter Lott, Jr., July 19, 1762; Peter Lott, Sr., March 9, 1764; Michael Reynolds, Dec. 3, 1769; Joseph Dennis, Oct. 7, 1779; John Kinnan, Sept. 13, 1793; James Dorset, Sept. 18, 1794; Jesse Stout, Aug. 18, 1795; Margaret Mears, daughter of Richard and Martha Mears, Sept. 9, 1796; Leonora Bissett, Nov. 8, 1796; Richard Mears, son of Richard and Martha Mears, Oct. 15, 1803; John Combs, Oct. 23, 1803; Phebe, wife of John Herbert, Dec. 6, 1804; Gemina, wife of Samuel Culver, April 6, 1805; Asher Bissett, Oct. 3, 1805; Benjamin Brown, April 14, 1806.

The burying-ground of the old Baptist Church at Washington was opened early, and it is probable that interments were made there in 1800. The old graves are numerous, but none of them are marked by any headstones, except in some instances common fieldstones with no inscriptions whatever. The oldest monuments to be seen have not been standing more than sixty years. Like many of those of a later date, they bear the names of deceased members of the families of Obert, Messler, De Voe, Rue, Barkeley, Norman, Stults, Frazer, Willet, Hardenbrook, Sheppard, Kleine, Ackerman, and Booraem, all prominent names in the history of the township in successive periods. The following inscription is from one of the oldest monuments in the cemetery, that of Frederick A. Kleine, formerly a leading citizen of the village and southern part of Middlesex County :

"In memory of Frederick A. Kleine, who died the 18th day of August, 1829, in the 52d year of his age. He was a native of Germany, but for many years a respectable resident of this place. As postmaster of this village he was faithful in the discharge of his duties. He was a man of sound understanding. Of a tenacious memory, and of an even, kind, and pacific disposition, he was a kind neighbor, a sincere and steady friend, and felt a brotherly attachment for the whole race of man."

The cemetery in the churchyard of the Reformed Dutch Church of Spottswood contains many graves, but none of them were made at a date sufficiently early to render the publication of inscriptions from any of the monuments of historical interest.

In the neighborhood of Old Bridge are some old graves, and it is possible there are others scattered about the township, which, if they could be rescued from the oblivion into which they are gradually sinking, would be regarded as interesting memorials of the days that are gone.

WASHINGTON MONUMENTAL CEMETERY ASSOCIATION.—The Washington Monumental Cemetery Association was formed Dec. 6, 1856, under the laws of the State. The first board of managers was composed of Nicholas Booraem, John S. Connet, Thomas Peterson, John R. Reed, Samuel Whitehead, Sr., Elisha N. Blew, Robert M. Taylor, Henry Gordon, and Garret I. Snediker. The president of the association was Samuel Whitehead, Sr.; the vice-president, John R. Reed; the secretary, Henry Gordon; and the treasurer, John S. Connet. The cemetery is located on an elevation a little less than half a mile south of the centre of the village, overlooking Sayreville, Bonhamtown, and Piscataway. It is laid out in lots twenty-four by thirty-four feet each, is well shaded by numerous fine cedars, and is kept in good order. In the centre stands a monument about twenty-four feet in height, on which are cut the names of the contributors to its erection and the managers of the cemetery and several appropriate inscriptions. The first body interred in the cemetery was that of Rebecca J., wife of Peter Fisher, Jan. 3, 1857. The interments to the present time number about 1500.

CHESTNUT HILL CEMETERY ASSOCIATION.—The Chestnut Hill Cemetery Association was formed in 1861, with William Rogers as president, J. H. Bloodgood as treasurer, James Cooley as secretary, and the following-named directors : William Rogers, John J. Disbrow, Stephen H. Herbert, John B. Herbert, and John A. Montgomery. The association purchased of David Bissett fifty acres of land on the elevation northwest of and overlooking Old Bridge village, which was surveyed and laid out in lots suitable for burial purposes, and opened to the public under the name of Chestnut Hill Cemetery. The present officers of the association are A. J. Disbrow, president; J. H. Bloodgood, treasurer; and Herbert Appleby, secretary. The directors are William Rogers, William M. Appleby, J. H. Bloodgood, A. J. Disbrow, Herbert Appleby.

Villages and Hamlets.—WASHINGTON is located on the left bank of South River, three miles from its confluence with the Raritan, five miles from New Brunswick, and thirty-five from New York. It is said to have been first settled about 1720 by Harts-horne Willett,¹ who owned considerable land in the vicinity, from which circumstance the locality was known as Willettstown until about 1784, when Abraham Barkelew, a pioneer and a great admirer of Washington, renamed the then mere frontier settlement in his honor. The post-office was established under the name of Washington, and was so called until it became necessary to change the title on account of frequent miscarriage of mail intended for this place to other post-offices of the same name, when the present post-office name of South River was adopted by authority of the Post-Office Department.

In 1800, Washington did not embrace more than half a dozen houses. In 1823 the number did not exceed ten. There was one store, kept by Vincent Barkelew, then the principal business man, on the south side of Main Street near the dock. About 1825 the post-office was opened by Frederick A. Kleine, first postmaster, in a small building within the present limits of Theodore Willett's brickyard, where Robinson Thomas was at that time manufacturing paints. The present postmaster is Mr. H. Schroeder.

The earliest local merchant of whom any record exists was a man named Perrine. Reden Wood and Elias Doughty had a store at the dock during the war of 1812-14, and were engaged in carrying government property via the South River. In consequence of the embargo of that time great quantities of goods were brought overland to Washington and carried thence by water to New York. Samuel Gordon, of South Amboy, and later of Washington, was then a prominent boatman. In 1823 he came to Washington, and was instrumental in securing the passage of an act of Legislature authorizing the construction of a canal from the South River to the Raritan with a view to improving the transportation between New York and Washington, later constructing the canal under contract. He also opened the road from Washington to Cranbury. His son, Samuel Gordon, Jr., still a resident of the village, erected the first brick house there in 1825.

Under the influence of the wood and grain trade a large shipping business grew up at Washington. From 1825 to 1855 the peach trade was a prominent interest, and Washington became a depot for the transportation of fruit to New York. From 1840 onward until the trade subsided it was not uncommon to see the streets of the village filled for a long distance from the dock with wagons laden with peaches awaiting their turn to unload, and from four to half a dozen steamers left Washington daily for New York. These industries caused an increase in population, and in 1834 the village had two taverns, three stores, and thirty or forty dwellings. Several docks were built, which were known respectively as "Overt's," "Reed's," "Barkalew's," "Dunham's," "Booraem's," and "Blew's." Some of these have been abandoned, and some of them are now known by the names of later owners.

Washington occupied an advantageous position on the shortest and most direct route between New York and Philadelphia before the era of railways. In 1823 a steamboat route was established between New York and Washington, whence a regular line of stages conveyed passengers to the Delaware River at Bordentown, provided with the facilities for freight transportation then in vogue. It was known as the "Citizens' Line," and was superseded about 1830 by the Camden and Amboy Railroad, then completed as far as Hightstown. During this period Washington advanced somewhat in population and importance. New inhabitants moved into the surrounding country, larger stores were built, and an extensive trade grew up, which has continued in a great measure to the present time.

Prominent among local merchants of the past were Messrs. John Combs, James R. Dunham, Reid & Snedeker, Aaron Gulick, Thomas McDowell, the Stults Brothers, William Conover, and William Whitehead. John Combs has been referred to as a pioneer and the son of a pioneer. Mr. Dunham was highly esteemed, and has been dead many years. John R. Reid was a large property-owner and a successful business man. He died two years ago, aged eighty-five. He began his mercantile career in the store of John Combs as a clerk. Messrs. Snedeker and Gulick were both enterprising men, and left their impress on the fortunes of the village. The latter was for a short time a partner of Thomas McDowell's, who succeeded the firm of Gulick & McDowell, establishing a large trade and engaging largely in the carrying trade. In 1836 he had a sloop built for the river trade, in 1838 a vessel for the coasting trade, and in 1848 a sea steamer (for the Southern trade mentioned below). In 1838 he engaged in the carrying trade between Charleston, S. C., and Georgetown. In 1840 he was prominent in the introduction of steamers between Washington and New York in the peach trade. In 1849 he became a pioneer merchant, business man, and official at Sacramento City, Cal., and revisited that State in 1852 and 1858; was in business in Melbourne, Australia, 1853-55, and was consul at the Cape of Good Hope, 1862-64. The Stults brothers, Henry and Frederick, are both elsewhere referred to, and are still living. Mr. Conover is remembered as an enterprising man. Mr. Whitehead represents the interests of Whitehead Brothers in New York. These merchants dealt largely in wood, fruit, and all marketable produce. An early physician was Dr. Tomlinson, who was there some time, dying about 1832. About this time came Dr. Henry B. Pole, a man of fine attainments, previously a Professor of Mathematics and a teacher under the direction of Rutgers College. He died about twenty years ago. His widow survives him, aged eighty-six. Dr. John C. Thompson came about 1857, and still remains. Dr. Dye came a few years ago, remaining only a short time.

The earliest tavern in the village of which any information is obtainable stood on the present site of the residence of Samuel Gordon, Jr., and was early kept by Henry Obert for many years. Capt. Samuel Martin was the landlord in 1823, and the building was torn down about 1830. George Obert kept another early tavern on Jackson Street, which was also torn down. The next was the East Brunswick House, now kept by B. B. Walker. Its builder, Robert Carson, was an Irishman, educated and of fine address, a man of honor, who died childless, leaving a large estate. Abraham Barkelew and Joseph Gulick built the Washington Hotel, now kept by J. C. Voorhees. In the past it has been kept by both of the builders, and later by Stephen H. Barkelew.

Ship-building has been carried on from 1824 to the present by the Booraems, father and sons, many vessels, large and small, having been built. From 1825 to 1860 much potter's ware was made by Jacob Eaton, Samuel Stout, and Samuel Whitehead. There was a grist-mill, owned by Whitehead & De Voe, in operation about 1867 for a short time, and there are some later enterprises of lesser magnitude. During recent years brick-making has been a leading industry, and a large business is done in the stronger clays, known as "fire-clay," "fire-sand," and "kaolin," nearly all the lands in the village bordering the river being devoted to these two interests.

An act entitled "An act for the improvement of the town of Washington, in the county of Middlesex," was passed in the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, and approved Feb. 23, 1870. It provided for the improvement of the village under the direction of a board of commissioners, to be elected annually, defining the limits of the town, as follows:

"Beginning at South River, in a line of lands between Randolph Low and John Culver, and running thence first up said line and on the same course to the centre of the road leading from Old Bridge to New Brunswick, near (formerly) Sheriff Bissett's house; second, following the centre of said road, the different courses thereof, to a line of lands between Charles Van Deventer and Messrs. Mesler's; third, down the said line, and a line of Garline and Abraham Van Deventer, to South River aforesaid; fourth, up said river, the courses thereof, to the place of beginning."

The first meeting of the commissioners was held May 12, 1870, at the public-house of B. B. Walker. The following have served as commissioners: Garret I. Snediker, 1870, 1872, 1874, 1875; James Bissett, 1870; Charles Whitehead, 1870-74, 1875-81; W. C. Barkelew, 1870, 1871; Maximilian Frommel, 1870, 1873; Daniel Morgan, 1871, 1874-76; William Van Zandt, 1871-73; Charles Connet, 1871; Frederick Stults, 1872, 1874-78; George E. Brown, 1872, 1876-81; Thomas Booraem, 1873-76; Jonathan H. Peterson, 1873; William H. Peterson, 1873; Isaac Blew, 1877-79; Isaac Barkelew, 1877-81; Charles Serviss, 1879-81; Daniel Selover, 1880, 1881.

The population of Washington is about 1200. It contains one extensive dry-goods and clothing-store, Jacob Levinson, proprietor, three large grocery and provision-stores, with Messrs. F. W. Bissett, Kleine & Thorburn, and C. W. Connet as proprietors, and a smaller store kept by Mrs. Phebe Tuttle, two hotels, several saloons, a liquor-store, a ship-yard, four brick-yards, a shirt-factory, the usual variety of small mechanics' shops, and a Methodist and an Episcopalian Church and two Baptist Churches.

SPOTTSWOOD is on the southeast border of the township, on South River, near the mouth of Machaponix Creek, and is a station on the Camden and Amboy branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad, ten miles from South Amboy.

Among the earliest residents at or near there of whom any records are extant were Right Hon. David Carnegie (Lord Rosehill), John Lewis Johnston, James Rue, Samuel Neilson, David Stout, Richard Lott, James Abrahams, and Joseph and John Perrine, referred to in the charter of St. Peter's Church, granted Nov. 23, 1773, by William Franklin, the last royal Governor of New Jersey, as "all freeholders and inhabitants of the town of Spottswood," etc. There are at least two different accounts of the manner in which the village received its name, and there is a difference of opinion as to whether Spottswood should be spelled with one t or two. The historian inclines to the belief that John Lewis Johnston, of the ancient family of "Spottiswoode in Scotland," conferred the name upon the then small settlement which the village now bears in honor of his ancestral town, and that having been derived from such a source its correct modernized orthography is as it appears in these pages. In the charter referred to above Spottswood is described as being "in the South Ward of the city of Perth Amboy," and from the fact that Joseph and John Perrine, grandfather and father of Judge John Perrine, were both at that time located at Machaponix, now in Monroe, it would appear possible if not probable that the area known as Spottswood in 1773 was much more extensive than the present boundaries of the village. It is pretty certain some of those above mentioned did not remain at Spottswood as permanent residents. John Lewis Johnston or another member of his family whom he represented was in possession of much land at and adjacent to the present village.

Spottswood owes its existence as a village to the splendid water-power there and near there. It has been known as a manufacturing point since 1750 and perhaps longer. An association of three men named Perry, Corne, and Hays, and known as the "Forge Company," were manufacturing iron there for at least twenty-six years before the beginning of the Revolution, at which time or soon afterwards they are supposed to have fled to England, whence it is thought they had come, abandoning their property, which consisted, as is believed, of a grist-mill, a furnace with trip-hammer, a store, and several houses and other buildings, and an extensive tract of land or numerous small tracts near each other. By a series of transfers the site of the active operations of these men has come into the possession of Isaac De Voe. During the Revolution there was a paper-mill in operation where the Tecumseh Snuff-Mills now are, in which it is authoritatively stated the paper was manufactured on which the Continental notes were printed. A still earlier mill-site was that where Outcalt's hominy-mills are located, where the half-Indian Weech-queechley had a saw-mill at a date too remote to be fixed at this time.

The supremacy which Spottswood thus early asserted as a manufacturing centre it has maintained steadily to the present, especially in certain departments of manufacturing industry, most prominent among which has for many years been snuff-making, nearly all the snuff-mills in New Jersey having been located there. From some time early in the present century until 1881 Messrs. Daniel Snowhill, William Dill, Andrew Snowhill, George H. Snowhill, John Appleby, William Appleby, Isaac De Voe, Augustus A. De Voe, John D. Outcalt, John Outcalt, John Browne, William Perrine, Leonard Appleby, George W. Helme, Phineas M. Skippers, William A. Skippers, Lewis E. Skippers, and others have all been extensively engaged in snuff manufacture, some of them adding a large business in the manufacture of fine-cut tobacco and cigars, involving an immense aggregated capital and affording employment to many persons of both sexes. The milling interest has always been prominent. It has been represented by many enterprising men, among them the "Forge Company," John Hilliker, John H. Disborough, George H. Snowhill, William Conover, John Appleby, Isaac De Voe, and Charles B. Hulit; the paper-making business by John H. Disborough and Disborough & Beebe; the tanning interest by Matthias Prest and George Lane; and the distilling interest by John Browne and John H. Disborough. The leading manufacturers of the present time are Isaac De Voe & Son, Skippers & Co., and George W. Helme, snuff manufacturers; Charles B. Hulit, miller; John Outcalt, hominy manufacturer; and Leonard Appleby, manager of Rothschild's shirt-factory, several others carrying on a variety of manufacturing and mechanical pursuits in shops in various portions of the village.

Merchants have been numerous in Spottswood, and some of them only remained in the village a short time, years since, and their names cannot now be recalled. Prominent tradesmen there have been the following: Messrs. Perry, Corne & Hays (the "Forge Company"), Daniel Snowhill, John Disborough, Stephen Smith, Jr., Richard Manny, Merrill Mundy, John Perrine, Rensen Appleby, George H. Snowhill, Orlando Perrine, John Appleby, James D. Farrington, Isaac De Voe, Male & Mathews, Stephen D. Smith, James L. Cole. The present merchants are Messrs. E. Ayres, J. A. Charlton, Charles Breucker, L. A. Snowhill, W. A. Skinner & Son, C. B. Culver.

The following are the names of the principal physicians who have practiced at Spottswood: Drs. Cornelius Johnson, H. D. B. Lefferts, F. L. Wagner, H. J. Disbrow, and H. B. Garner, the present resident practitioner. The first public-house was built by Jacob Van Cleef, and kept by him for many years. After his death it was for a time presided over by his widow. Her successors have been Joseph Wallace, James Jernee, and the present landlord, John Vleit. Another tavern was kept by George Sharp, and later by James Jernee. It is now out of use. The Railroad House was built by some of the Snowhills, and completed soon after the construction of the railway through the village. It was kept by William Snowhill, and at a later date and until a few years since by his widow. William Sawyer succeeded to the management, and at his death was succeeded by his widow, Mrs. M. E. Sawyer, at present in charge.

Under the influence of the various manufacturing enterprises which have been carried on there, Spottswood long since became a place of note, and is now known throughout the Union as the oldest and one of the most important of the few snuff-manufacturing towns. The place has an air of thrift and comfort, and schools and the churches are well sustained there. The latter are three in number,—St. Peter's Episcopal, the Spottswood Methodist Episcopal, and the Reformed Dutch. The present postmaster is Stephen Smith.

OLD BRIDGE.—The village of Old Bridge derives its somewhat curious name from the fact that the first bridge spanning South River was built there, and after other bridges were built across the stream at other points became known as "the old bridge," and the settlement at that point early acquired and has since retained the name of "Old Bridge," though for a time it was by many called "Herbertsville," in honor of Gen. Obadiah Herbert, who was for many years, dating from early in the present century, a prominent man of business there, and the projector and proprietor of business enterprises which added to the importance and reputation of the locality.

Old Bridge is located at the head of navigation on South River, and is a station on the Camden and Amboy branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad. It early became a point at which immense quantities of produce, wood, and other merchandise was received and shipped by way of South River to New York, some of which was hauled many miles from neighborhoods far beyond the limits of Middlesex County.

A large tract of land at and near the village was early owned by the Van Wickle family, and some of it has descended by inheritance to heirs of the original purchasers, who hold it at this time. Another large tract of land there was, and some of it is now, owned by members of the Bissett family.

The site of the village was the scene of an incident of historical interest during the Revolutionary war. In the early part of 1777, when the British were in possession of New Brunswick and Amboy, quite a large force of their soldiery crossed the country to Old Bridge, destroying property and seizing cattle and desirable portable articles in their march, and were there met by a small detachment from Amboy, who conducted them to the latter place by bateaux via South River.

An early and enterprising resident of Old Bridge was Gen. James Morgan, who soon after the close of the Revolution, in company with Jacob Van Wickle, put a pottery in operation there which was continued until about 1828, a second establishment of a similar character having been started by some of the Bissetts about 1815, which was in operation till about 1830. Gen. Obadiah Herbert came to the place about 1810, and at once became a large property-owner, and a leading spirit in business and social life there. He opened a store and constructed docks and warehouses and engaged very extensively in the shipment of wood, produce, and other marketable merchandise to New York. The wood trade there was at one time immense, and it was a leading interest until within a few years. For the trade which he thus established he had several vessels built at Old Bridge, and a shipyard was in existence there for a few years.

The distillery established by James C. Stout about 1835, and now continued by his son, S. W. Stout; Van Wickle's fanning-mill factory, in operation about 1835-40, and that of Leonard Appleby and James C. Stout, about 1840-50, and the snuff-mill, operated successively by John and William Dill, about 1860-75, were prominent enterprises of the past in the line of manufacture. Stout's distillery, Dill's saw-mill, and Brown's clothing-factory are the principal manufacturing industries of the present time. J. H. Bloodgood has a wheelwright- and blacksmith-shop, and there are two or three other small repair-shops of different kinds.

The following physicians have at various times resided in Old Bridge: Drs. Lears, Jamison, H. D. B. Lefferts, and James Leighton. The present resident medical practitioner is Dr. S. M. Disbrow.

The following-named merchants have had stores in the village, either as sole proprietors or in company with others referred to at periods nearly coincident with the dates mentioned:

Charles Morgan, from soon after the Revolution until 1800; Gen. Obadiah Herbert, 1810-40; James C. Stout, 1826-60; Leonard Appleby, 1826-36; John Perrine, 1829-36; James Appleby, 1829-55; A. J. Disbrow (most of the time), 1836-61; Theodore Appleby, 1838-74; William Appleby, 1857-81 (most of the time); Jacob Waters, 1858-60; Thomas Vanderveer, 1860-65; R. S. Herbert, 1865-70; George Dobson, 1865-70; E. T. Brown, 1869-81; William P. Brown, 1874-77; J. H. Charlton, 1877-78; S. M.

Disbrow, 1877-81; John W. Davison, 1878-81. A man named Willis was for a time a partner of Gen. Herbert's. James Ricketts was an early merchant, and his son traded there in partnership with one Patton. Charles P. Hoffman, who began business there in 1881, S. M. Disbrow, and John W. Davison are the present merchants.

There are two churches in this village, the Independent Bethel Baptist and the Simpson Methodist Episcopal. The one hotel there is kept by Mrs. Rebecca Spencer. The postmaster since 1836 has been Judge A. J. Disbrow, now sheriff of Middlesex County.

MILLTOWN is a small but thrifty manufacturing village, mostly in North Brunswick but partially in this township, which owes its existence to the presence at that point of the factory of the Meyer Rubber Company. It was early known as Bergen's Mills, from the circumstance of the erection of an early grist-mill there, which later (sixty-five or seventy years ago) was owned by Jacob I. Bergen; but that, like the nucleus of the present village, was on the North Brunswick side of Lawrence's Brook. On the East Brunswick side there were only two or three houses as late as 1816. There are now a good number of substantial dwellings, most of which are occupied by operatives in the rubber-shoe factory and their families. A German Reformed Church, the stores of William Kuhlthian, George Roeder, and Philip Schlosser, two hotels, some small shops of different kinds, two meat-markets, a barber-shop and cigar manufactory, and the box-factory of the Meyer Rubber Company, whose principal works are in North Brunswick.

BLOOMFIELD MILLS, DUNHAM'S CORNERS, AND OTHER NEIGHBORHOODS.—Bloomfield Mills is the site of the extensive liquorice-factory of that name, and a flag-station on the Camden and Amboy branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Dunham's Corners is a well-known cross-roads neighborhood, very near the centre of the township, which received its name from Capt. Jehu Dunham, the pioneer in that vicinity. The Central Hotel, where town-meetings have been sometimes held, was formerly called the "Franklin House." Former landlords there were — Applegate, Enos Ayres, and William Hoagland. Charles Culver is the present proprietor. Ryder's tavern, where Seaman F. Christian now lives, between New Brunswick and Washington, was long kept by "Widow Ryder," and was known as the "Svan Hotel." It was destroyed by fire. The old sign now swings before another hostelry near by.

Societies.—THE WASHINGTON BENEVOLENT SOCIETY was organized Feb. 21, 1869, with the following charter members, twelve in number: Maximilian Frommel, Aloys Allgaier, John Brown, George Koch, Charles Kananssenn, John Knab, Jacob Levinson, Gustav Wall, Peter Hoffman, John Adam, Frederick Tacke, and Henry Schroeder.

Isaac DeVol

The principal officers of this society were as follows: President, Aloys Allgaier, 1869-70, Conrad Breuker, 1871; Vice-President, Charles Kananssmenn, 1869-70, John Adam, 1871; Secretary, Maximilian Frommel, 1869-71; Treasurer, Christopher Stoble, 1869-71.

Meetings were held in Peter Hoffman's hall, at the corner of Reed and Main Streets. Dissensions arose among the members and the society disbanded, and was reorganized two or three times under different names, for a time having an existence as a lodge of the Ancient Order of Druids (No. 21). Later it was known for a time by its original name, but finally ceased to be.

WHITNEY LODGE, No. 191, I. O. O. F., was instituted Aug. 6, 1877, by A. B. Crane, P. G., as Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey.

The first officers, as installed, were P. V. Petty, N. G.; W. H. Petty, V. G.; W. J. Bissett, Sec.; F. Beebe, Treas., all of Fidelity Lodge, No. 141, of Jamesburg, and D. W. Cozzens, Warden, from General Morgan Lodge, No. 96, of South Amboy. The above were also the charter members of the lodge.

At the first meeting six members were initiated. The lodge was established in a building near the railroad station, and removed to other and more suitable quarters in the spring of 1878. Only one death has occurred among the membership of the lodge since its institution. The present membership is forty-four, and the success of the lodge thus far warrants it in erecting a building near the centre of the village, which will be much more comfortable than its present place of meeting, and will also be of benefit to the community by affording a convenient and commodious assembly-room on the ground floor, which has been for a long time regarded as a necessity in Spottswood.

The successive Noble Grands have been P. V. Petty, W. H. Petty, W. H. Frishmuth, George W. Stanton, Charles Housel, Forman Matthews, and Augustus A. De Voe.

The following are the names of the present officers: Augustus A. De Voe, N. G.; James Riddle, V. G.; W. J. Bissett, Sec.; Francis Beebe, Treas.

An Incident.—The old Clarkson Brown grist-mill, now in the possession of Peter Jernee, on Tenant's Creek, below Old Bridge, is said to have been the scene of an incident that may as a reminiscence possess some interest for some of the readers of this work. It is stated that after the murder of the notorious Bill Poole in New York, officers from that city searched this mill and watched in the vicinity several days under the impression that his murderer was in hiding there.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ISAAC DE VOE.

The name of De Voe was formerly spelled Deveau, the family being of Huguenot descent. Its members fled from France to escape religious oppression, and passing through Alsace landed at Mannheim, Germany. Two of their number afterwards emigrated to the United States and settled in the vicinity of New York. Among the descendants of one of these brothers was the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, who resided on what was known as the Philip's Manor, within the present corporate bounds of New York City, before and during the war of the Revolution.

His son John, to whom this property was bequeathed, also made this his residence, and married his cousin, Rebecca De Voe. Their children were Isaac, John, Frederick, Daniel, James, William, Abram, Sarah, Alida, Jane, and Rebecca.

John, the second son, was born on the De Voe homestead, and later removed to what was then New York City (the family home being outside the city limits) and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He married Sophia, daughter of Thomas Farrington, of Westchester County, N. Y., and had children,—Isaac, Thomas F., James, Moses, John A., George W., Frederick W., Susanna, and two who died in infancy.

Isaac, whose life is briefly reviewed in this sketch, was born Aug. 20, 1808, at the homestead on Philip's Manor. The first six years of his life were spent on the farm, after which he removed to New York. A brief period having been spent at school, he began a business career, first as clerk for his father, and later at King's Bridge. He removed to Spottswood in 1834, and engaged as clerk with John Appleby, of that village. After an association of several years, in which he exhibited a marked fidelity to the interests of his employer, he, in 1847, formed a copartnership with the latter's son, William A., and engaged in the manufacture of snuff. He has from that time to the present continued the business, having recently admitted his son, Augustus A., to a partnership in the enterprise.

Mr. De Voe was married in 1839 to Miss Mary, daughter of John Appleby, of Spottswood. To this union were born twelve children, of whom two, William H. H. and Augustus A., survive and reside in Spottswood.

Mrs. De Voe having died in 1866, he was a second time married, Dec. 26, 1871, to Miss Ann, daughter of Henry B. Appleford, who was of English extraction. Mr. De Voe was in politics formerly a Henry Clay Whig, but later changed his views and became a Democrat. He does not seek official honors, though the office of justice of the peace has been filled with ability and discretion by him. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and senior warden of St. Peter's Church at Spottswood. Mr. De Voe has attained a position of independence and influence entirely by his own force of character and industry, and is still actively identified with the business interests of Spottswood, his residence.

LEONARD APPLEBY.

Mr. Appleby's life presents one of the marked examples of success as the reward of indefatigable industry. His family are of English descent, his grandfather having come from England and settled on Williams Manor, Westchester Co., N. Y. He had a numerous offspring, among whom was James, who located in New York and later removed to Middletown, Monmouth Co., N. J. He married a Miss Crawford, of Westchester County, N. Y., and had children,—William, John, and Elizabeth. By a second marriage to Miss Sarah, daughter of Obadiah Herbert, of Mount Pleasant, Monmouth Co., N. J., who was a surveyor, he had sons, Leonard and James, both of whom were born in New York City. The birth of their son Leonard occurred Oct. 4, 1798, in Duane Street, New York, where his early life was spent. He enjoyed but limited advantages of education, and when a lad engaged as clerk in a grocery-store on the corner of Morris and Greenwich Streets, after which he was apprenticed to a carpenter in the city of Brooklyn. He did not, however, complete this apprenticeship, but came to Old Bridge, Middlesex Co., and engaged as a clerk for his uncle, Obadiah Herbert. After the war of 1812 he embarked with John Appleby as a dealer in groceries at White's Landing, Middlesex Co. He was, on the 24th of October, 1821, united in marriage to Miss Ann Amanda Fitzallen Van Wickle, the ceremony having been performed by Bishop Cruse, of New Jersey.

Mrs. Appleby was the daughter of Jacob and Sarah Morgan Van Wickle, of Old Bridge, the former having been for fifty-three years judge of Middlesex County. The Morgans were of Revolutionary stock, Mrs. Van Wickle having been a niece of Gen. Daniel Morgan. Their children were Stephen Van Wickle, born Nov. 19, 1822; Leonard Lafayette, whose birth occurred Sept. 9, 1824; Hyacinthia Adeline, born Oct. 31, 1826, who became Mrs. John S. Sutphen; Sarah Aurora Morgan, born Oct. 18, 1828 (deceased), who married George W. Bampton; Malvenah, born Oct. 29, 1830 (deceased); Margaret, born Nov. 30, 1832, now Mrs. George Helme; Ann Amanda, born July 11, 1834 (deceased); Jacob Charles, born July 4, 1836; Remsen, born March 31, 1838; Lyman, born Sept. 27, 1839 (deceased); and Julia, born Aug. 26, 1842, who became Mrs. John Outcalt.

In connection with the business in which he first engaged, Mr. Appleby began the purchase and shipment of wood, having secured nearly all the Forge lands, of which George C. Thomas was the agent. He also dealt extensively in lime, and embarked in the manufacture of pottery and fanning-mills. He began soon after the snuff and tobacco business, two miles southwest of Spottswood, on the site of the present Railroad Mills, a portion of the mills erected by him being still in use.

Mr. Appleby in 1837 repaired to New York and engaged with William Allison in the business of dry-goods under the style of Appleby & Allison. Here he remained two years, after which he resumed the snuff trade, and also conducted a brokerage business. He was at this time a considerable owner of real estate, and largely engaged in its improvement and in the erection of buildings. In 1856 he removed to Spottswood, and having made extensive purchases of real estate at Perth Amboy devoted much of his time to the improvement or sale and transfer of property at this point. Mr. Appleby was also a practical engineer, which knowledge greatly aided him in his various business operations.

In politics he was formerly an Old-Line Whig, but later supported Stephen A. Douglas, and for the remainder of his life continued a Democrat. He was a strong party man, but without official aspirations. He was a man of integrity in all business transactions, and in the panic of 1837-38 met every obligation, as he did on all subsequent occasions. The death of Leonard Appleby occurred March 17, 1879, at Spottswood, in his eighty-second year. Here an imposing monument marks his last resting-place, the site being adjacent to St. Peter's Protestant Episcopal Church, of which he was a cordial supporter.

COL. LEONARD L. F. APPLEBY.

Col. Appleby is the grandson of James Appleby, and the son of Leonard Appleby and his wife, Sarah Herbert. An extended sketch of the former appears elsewhere in this volume, and renders repetition here unnecessary. He was a man of remarkable business capacity, and transmitted these qualities in a marked degree to his children.

The birth of his son, Leonard L. F., occurred Sept. 9, 1824, at Old Bridge, Middlesex County, where the years of his boyhood were spent. After such advantages as were offered at the district schools of the township, he engaged with his father in business as a clerk, having begun this active career at the age of seventeen.

After a faithful service of four years he was admitted to a partnership with him in the snuff business and removed to New York City, where this branch of industry was conducted. From that date until the day of his death the business relations of father and son were most intimate. They were joint owners of property and together engaged in various commercial transactions.

Andrew J. Disbrow

Col. Appleby was, on the 27th of January, 1847, united in marriage to Miss Harriet Amanda, daughter of John Appleby, of Spottswood, N. J., the ceremony having been performed at St. Peter's Protestant Episcopal Church, Spottswood, by Rev. Alfred Stubbs, of New Brunswick, N. J. To this marriage were born children,—Leonard, whose birth occurred April 30, 1849, in Spottswood; Charles Edgar, born in New York, Aug. 2, 1850, and who died Dec. 30, 1851; Sarah Farrington, born at Old Bridge, Oct. 27, 1855, and now Mrs. William Sawyer, of Spottswood.

The death of Mrs. Appleby having occurred Dec. 23, 1867, the colonel was again married on the 16th of July, 1872, to Miss Georgianna Jackson, granddaughter of Moses Wilcox, of New Brunswick, N. J. This marriage was also solemnized by Rev. Alfred Stubbs.

The politics of Col. Appleby were formerly of the school of Old-Line Whigs, but subsequent events changed his views and caused him to espouse the platform of the Democratic party, which he still indorses. He is not an aspirant for official honors, which have been frequently offered him, but has nevertheless been twice elected justice of the peace of his township, which office he still holds. He has been identified with the militia of the State, and has served on the staffs of both Governors Charles S. Olden and Theodore F. Randolph. He still manifests an active interest in the politics of the county and State, and frequently participates in the various campaigns to the extent of exerting his influence in favor of all measures for the public welfare. Though practically a gentleman of leisure, he is identified with the business interests of Spottswood, and the owner of an extensive shirt-factory, of which his son Leonard is manager. The colonel is in his religious preferences an Episcopalian, though he and his father were the principal contributors towards the erection of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the village. The cause of morality and religion, irrespective of denomination, finds in him a cordial helper and friend.

HON. ANDREW J. DISBROW.

The present incumbent of the office of sheriff of Middlesex County, Hon. A. J. Disbrow, is of sturdy English stock. His grandfather, John Disbrow, was a farmer, residing in Matchaponix, Middlesex Co., and served with the New Jersey light-horse cavalry at the battle of Monmouth during the Revolutionary war, after which he with others was detailed to bury those who had fallen in that sanguinary encounter. He was married to Susanna Morgan, of South Amboy, sister of Gen. James Morgan, and granddaughter of Nicholas Everson. Their children were Daniel, who died unmarried, Nicholas Morgan, James Morgan, Charles Morgan, Hannah (Mrs. William I. Dey), Catherine (Mrs. Peter Burlew), and Elsie (Mrs. Alfred Letts).

Nicholas Morgan, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born at Matchaponix, N. J., in 1783, and in early life removed to Matawan, N. J., where he acquired the trade of a hatter. There he married Mary, daughter of Cornelius P. Vanderhoef, and a descendant of the Hun family, who then occupied a position of much prominence in the State.

Their children are Stephen M., a physician residing at Farmingdale, N. J.; Andrew J.; John N., living at Matawan; Peter C., also at Matawan; Edwin C., of Ocean Grove; Mary (Mrs. John W. Denyse), deceased; Delia Ann (Mrs. Charles Fardon), of Holmdel, N. J.; Catherine (Mrs. Richard Van Brackel); and Edwin C. and Phebe, who died in infancy.

Andrew J. was born Feb. 29, 1816, at Matawan, N. J. His active career was begun as clerk in the post-office of the city of Brooklyn, and also as assistant in a book-store. He removed in 1834 to Old Bridge, as clerk for Leonard Appleby, with whom he remained six years, after which he succeeded to the business. He then acquired a knowledge of surveying and conveyancing, in which he has been engaged during his active business career. He was married in 1835 to Miss Susan, daughter of James Brown, who died soon after, and Mr. Disbrow was again married to Miss Margaret R., daughter of Mahlon G. Searle, of Philadelphia. They have had children,—Mary (Mrs. Joseph A. Charlton), Sarah (Mrs. S. W. South), Stephen M., Eureka, deceased, and one who died in infancy.

When a lad Mr. Disbrow was a fearless champion of the Democracy, though he later became a Whig, from which resulted his indorsement of the principles of the Republican party.

He has been actively identified with politics during the whole of his life, having been postmaster at Old Bridge, N. J., for a period of forty-six years, which commission he still holds. He has also served for forty-two years as justice of the peace, and has for years been commissioner of deeds for the township.

Mr. Disbrow held for five years the honorable position of judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and at present fills the office of sheriff of the county of Middlesex. His excellent judgment and marked probity make his services much sought in the settlement of estates and in the duties devolving upon trustees and guardians.

Mr. Disbrow is in his religious preferences a Baptist. He contributed liberally towards the erection of the Baptist Church at Old Bridge, and has served as a member of its board of trustees.

SOUTH BRUNSWICK.¹

Situation and Boundaries.—South Brunswick is located in the southwestern part of Middlesex County. Its boundaries are formed by North Brunswick and East Brunswick on the north, East Brunswick, Monroe, and Cranbury on the east, Cranbury and West Windsor (Mercer County) on the south, and Princeton (Mercer County) and Franklin (Somerset County) on the west.

Descriptive.—The most extensive township in the county and one of the earlier in organization, South Brunswick has long been historically one of the most important of those lying south of the Raritan. Its nearness to Princeton and Trenton caused its territory to be occupied early, and the passage through it of the "straight" or Trenton turnpike and the more serpentine George's road, now known as the New Brunswick and Cranbury turnpike, have rendered its rolling surface long familiar to the travelers from New Brunswick southward. Friendship road and Ridge road are much traveled thoroughfares in the southern part. The great ditch in the northeastern part is evidence of time and money expended in the drainage of Pigeon Swamp, an extensive tract of marshland, long unreclaimed, and the "Indian Fields," near the southeastern corner, mark the location of an Indian encampment when settlement began.

The township is drained by Lawrence's Brook, which rises in the northern part, by Devil's Brook in the southwestern, and Heathcote's Brook in the western part, the latter two emptying into the Millstone River, which flows for some distance along its southern and western boundary.

The soil is good tillable land, abounding in different places in gravel, and containing much sandy and clayey loam.

The New York Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad traverses the township north and south, and at Monmouth Junction, a little west of the centre, connects with the Rocky Hill Railroad and the Western Extension of the Freehold and Jamesburg Railroad.

The Delaware and Raritan Canal has its course, in a north and south direction, across the extreme western portion of the township, parallel with the Millstone, which it crosses by an aqueduct near Gray's Mills.

In 1880 the value of real estate in South Brunswick was $1,280,966. The personal property was valued at $257,958. The total taxable valuation was $1,366,000. The number of voters was 675.

In 1840 the population was 2795; in 1850, 3389; in 1880, 2803.

Settlement.—The location of South Brunswick near Trenton and other old towns west and south, and the passage through it of the roads traversed from Amboy and New Brunswick south and southwest, and early and long the principal stage-routes of this section of the State, were conducive to its early settlement. Along the stage-routes taverns were at a remote date established at Rhode Hall, at Dayton, and at Kingston, and about these houses of public entertainment settlements gradually grew up, which in time extended in all directions, until the township became generally populated. After the tavern-keepers it is thought that blacksmiths and wheelwrights were the next to locate at the "stage-houses" they had established, the large number of stages and horses used in the passenger transportation, in constant need respectively of reshoeing and repairs, giving them time ample employment. At Rhode Hall² the pioneer inn-keeper was David Williamson, from Bonnie Scotland, who bestowed upon the locality the appellation by which it has since been known, and gathered about him a little settlement of people, most of whom were Scotch by birth or descent.

Williamson came as early as 1730, and purchased a large tract of land. He had three daughters,—Mary, who married George Thompson and removed to New Brunswick, and after his death returned to Rhode Hall, and becoming the wife of Thomas McDowell lived and died there; Lydia, who married Stephen Jones and resided at Clarksville, N. J.; and Ann, who married James Schureman, of New Brunswick.

(1) Thomas McDowell located at Rhode Hall in 1774, and purchasing the estate of David Williamson engaged in farming and tavern-keeping. He was twice married, first to Mary Williamson, a daughter of David, and after her death to Catharine Lott, and had four sons,—Andrew, George T., John, and Thomas. (2) Andrew married Ann Wetherill and settled at Dayton. (3) George T. married Rachel Gulick, and bought and lived on the McDowell homestead, and was a somewhat extensive farmer. His children were Emeline, James, Thomas, Catherine, Andrew, Elizabeth, Mary, Susan, and Agnes. Emeline married Jacob Owens, from New York, and settled at Rhode Hall; James, Amelia Freeman, locating and dying in New Brunswick; Thomas, Jane L. Martin, of Washington, where he is now living; Catharine, Israel H. Voorhees, of New Brunswick; Andrew, Mary Ann Conover, locating on a portion of the family homestead; Mary, Isaac S. Bennett, now a resident on part of the homestead; Susan, first, Reed Slover, and second, Daniel Griggs; and Agnes, Samuel Applegate, living in Ohio. Elizabeth recently died unmarried.

Simmons Smock, who married Lydia Scheuck, of New Brunswick, located early at Rhode Hall, and engaged in farming and later in tavern-keeping, opening the well-remembered "Stage Hall House," now kept by his son, John Snock. He had two sons, James and John, and three daughters. James married Rachel Gulick, and lives on the homestead. John, the hotel-keeper, married Emeline Gulick. One of the daughters, Catharine Ann, married and located in New Brunswick.

Jehu Pierson, a farmer, settled in the Rhode Hall neighborhood about 1760. He married Maria Vanderhoof, and had children named John Cornelius, Peter, Ellen, and William. John located at Washington, in East Brunswick. Cornelius married and remained at Rhode Hall and reared a family. John, his son, resides on the homestead. Peter was a farmer at Rhode Hall, where he married and had several children. Ellen died unmarried. William was a farmer, and lived and died at Rhode Hall. Another settler in this vicinity was John Probasco, a carpenter, who came about 1775, married there, and had children named Letitia, Sarah, John, and Maria, and died there about 1835.

About 1774, Farrington Barkelew was a settler at Rhode Hall, where he became an extensive landowner. His children were John, William, Sarah, Daniel, and Elizabeth. William married Rachel McDowell, and removed to Cranbury; Sarah became the wife of Richard Slover, of Rhode Hall, and bore him children named Mary, Elizabeth, Farrington B., and William R. Slover; Daniel lived on the old place and never married; Elizabeth married Cornelius Slover. Their children were named Mary, Margaret, John P., and Woodhull.

In the same vicinity Reuben Van Pelt located as early as 1774. He was a farmer, and married a Miss Griggs, and had children named Gilbert, John, Isaac, Sarah, Letitia, and Mary. None of his descendants are living in the township.

About 1800, Benjamin Petty, from Long Island, N. Y., located at Rhode Hall, and was a farmer. His children were Isaac, Benjamin, Absalom, Charity, James, Jason, and John. The family became scattered, and none of them now live in the township. Benjamin Petty and his wife both died in South Brunswick within a week, at the age of ninety-two, there being only fifteen days' difference in their ages.

The Van Dyke family settled here before the Revolution and were numerous. One of them, John Van Dyke, a farmer, married Catharine Reed, of Monmouth County. He had children named Sarah, Catharine, Henry, and Richard Reid. The daughters married and removed from the township. The sons remained on the homestead and became well known.

William Rue was a farmer at Rhode Hall at a comparatively early date, and died at the age of sixty-five.

John Rue lived in the township during the Revolution it is supposed.

The pioneer inn-keeper at Dayton was James Whitlock, who was there as early as 1750, and later sold out to John Barricklo. The Terhune family were early settlers in that locality, and are supposed to have, some of them, been there as early as 1700, if not earlier. However, there is no means of ascertaining the date of their arrival. The earliest record of the family to be found is in the family Bible, where Garret Terhune is stated to have been born, as is thought, in South Brunswick, as now defined, in 1737. This relic of the past is one of the old-fashioned kind, bearing evidences of many years' use, and is now in the possession of Abraham Terhune, a grandson of Garret's, now advanced in life, and in whose family his sister, Mary Ann, is living, unmarried, aged about eighty. Garret Terhune was the owner of a large tract of land near Dayton, some of which was after his death owned by his descendants. He married Ellen Hoagland, who bore him children, as follows: John, Abraham, Cornelius, Garret, Isaac, Alchia, Helen, Mary, Elizabeth, and Catharine. Besides the facts above stated little can be learned of the Terhunes except that John died many years ago; Abraham married Mary Van Pelt; Cornelius married and removed to Princeton; Garret died, unmarried, at Dayton; Isaac married Jane McDowell and lived near the old homestead; and that the children of Abraham were Mary Ann, Eliza Jane, Garret, and Abraham, of whom Eliza Jane married M. R. Anderson, of Dayton, and after his death removed to and is living at Spottswood, while Garret died unmarried, and Abraham married Sarah McDowell, and is a hotel-keeper at Dayton.

At Kingston settlement began very early, and the names of few of the pioneers can be learned. Withington and Vantilburgh were the early landlords there. Vantilburgh's house was often honored by visits from Washington and the early Governors of the province, and Withington's was a great stage depot, and was one of the most famous inns in East New Jersey. There was a church in this settlement as early as 1723, but it was not in the present county of Middlesex, and Vantilburgh's was also across the line in Somerset County.

As early as 1700 (1) Jediah Higgins located near Kingston, on the road from New Brunswick to Bordentown, purchasing one thousand acres of land of the Indians for the amazingly low price of a sow and a litter of pigs. It seems inconceivable that the noble red men should have parted with so much soil for such a compensation. It may be that pork was scarce with them that year, or they may have known where some one had some red cloth and brass gewgaws to barter for a small herd of swine. If it could be ascertained that they had such a speculation as this in mind the wonder would not be so great. That an Indian should, in a country full of game, sell land enough to make four or five respectable farms for not enough pork to make a mouthful around at one tribal pow-wow seems incredible. If a bottle of the good old-fashioned unadulterated whisky which is said to have been plentiful with the pioneers had been the price offered, any account of the transaction would be received as a matter of course by the average reader with even a traditional knowledge of the Indian's love for "fire-water."

The sons of Jediah Higgins were named Joshua, Jediah, and Joseph. Joseph and Jediah removed to Huntington and Monmouth Counties respectively. (1) Joshua married and remained on the homestead in South Brunswick, rearing a family of children named Samuel, Jediah, Mary, and Tunis. (2) Samuel married Rebecca Friese, and located near his father, having children named Samuel, Jr., James, Sarah, Stout, and Jediah. (3) Jediah married a Miss Putnam, and (4) Mary a member of the Gulick family, both living near Kingston. (5) Tunis was killed by accident at New Brunswick while in the line of march as a member of a military company during the last war with Great Britain. Accounts differ as to how the accident occurred. Samuel, Jr., son of Samuel, married Sarah Selover, and is living in South Brunswick; James, also a resident of the township, married Catherine Van Pelt, and after her death Margaret Smith. Sarah married Alexander Cook; Stout, Catharine Brown; and Jediah, Elmira Fisk, and all three removed to Somerset County.

Near Plainsboro, (1) Matthew Griggs was a resident in the latter part of the last century. His children were Matthew, Thomas, William, Sarah, Susan, Julia Ann, and David. (2) Matthew was a hatter by trade. After conducting a hat manufacturing business for a time at Princeton he removed to Ohio. (3) Thomas married Catharine Opdyke, and settled midway between Dayton and Plainsboro'. (4) William married a Miss Stout, and removed from this section. (5) Sarah married and went away. (6) Susan died in Indiana. (7) Julia Ann removed to New York State and died there. (8) David married Ann McDonald, and lived near Dayton. The children of Thomas were E. M., William, Charles H., Matthew, Johnson, Thomas, Julia Ann, and David. E. M. Griggs married Ruth Dean, and removed to Mercer County. William married Isabel Dean, and emigrated to Illinois. Charles H. married Elizabeth Longstreet, and lives in Cranbury. Matthew married a Miss Miseroll, and is a farmer in South Brunswick with a large family. Johnson, Julia, and David removed to Illinois. Thomas married into the Miseroll family, and resides near Dayton. James and Benjamin Griggs located in the township prior to or during the Revolution.

In 1780, John McCabe located at Plainsboro', and established himself as a tiller of the soil. He married Lydia Woodward, who bore him two children, who were named Apollo and Sarah. Apollo married Sarah Bunting, and lived on a part of his father's farm. Lydia, John, Mary, Elizabeth, Sarah, George, William, and Zedekiah were his children. Lydia married Charles Blake, and removed to East Brunswick. John married Deborah Clayton, and lives near the place of his birth. Mary married Edward Cromwell, and removed to Trenton, later returning to Plainsboro', where he died. Elizabeth and Sarah never married. The former is dead; the latter lives in Cranbury. George, unmarried, lives on the homestead. William married Margaret Soden, and lives at Dayton. Zedekiah lives at Plainsboro'. Sarah, daughter of John and sister of Apollo McCabe, died young.

A family of Claytons have been quite numerous in the township. It is thought the first of the name there was John Clayton, soon after the Revolution.

Robert Davison was an early comer about a mile and a half north of Plainsboro', where he purchased an extensive tract of land and reared a somewhat numerous family. Many of his descendants are residents of South Brunswick and adjoining townships.

At Fresh Ponds Samuel Combs was a settler about 1780, buying much land and setting up what was doubtless the first distillery in the township. His sons, Jonathan, John, and James, became well known. John located at Washington, in East Brunswick, and became a merchant and leading business man there. Later he lived for a time in New York City, removing thence to Old Bridge, in East Brunswick, where he was for some little time manufacturing lime. His wife was a Miss Jaques. Jonathan was a farmer near his father, and James resided upon the homestead. It is more than probable that Samuel Combs was not the first of the name to locate in the county, and possible that John Combs, who was a chosen freeholder in North Brunswick in 1780 and a justice of the peace 1778-98, and Jonathan Combs, who was a justice of the peace 1785-98, were his brothers, if they were not of a generation earlier. At least the identity of their Christian names with those of two of Samuel's sons and the unvarying orthography of the surname would justify such a supposition. Isaac and Daniel Slover were early in the township. They were Holland Dutchmen, and came about 1785, then young men. Isaac married Ann Grigg and had children named James, John, Abraham, Isaac, Peter, and Sarah. John died unmarried. Abraham was twice married, the last time to a Miss Abrahams. Peter married Miss Vanderveer, and Sarah, Alexander Snediker, and both lived in the township. Daniel Slover married Mary Vanderhoof, and had children named Peter, James, Daniel Crommelin, and Mary, none of whom live in the township.

George Wrightmire had located here before the Revolution. Many of the same family name are to be found in this and adjoining townships at this time.

Such particulars have been given as are obtainable at this date regarding the early settlers of South Brunswick and their families. Below appear the names of persons who were residents of the township during the Revolution, and who claimed to have sustained loss or damage to property in consequence of the war, for which they sought reimbursement from government at a subsequent date, each one swearing to a hill in detail which footed up to the amount set opposite his or her name. Some of the persons named were members of families already mentioned, and of many of them no inhabitant of the township at this time has any knowledge. The property damaged and destroyed was mostly outbuildings and fences, and that carried away consisted of cattle, swine, sheep, and household stores, including cooked food and such movable property as soldiers marching or foraging through the country would be likely to confiscate for their immediate personal convenience and benefit; for it is related that many a red Britisher and many a hungry patriot sat down to dinners to which they had never been invited in South Brunswick, and ate many a roasted fowl and many an ear of roasted corn stolen from the scattered settlers along the roads through the township, which delicacies were prepared for consumption over fires made of the settlers' fences or sticks abstracted without undue ceremony from their wood-piles.

The following are the names of the claimants, with the amount claimed by each, expressed in pounds, shillings, and pence:

Organization.—Erected as an independent township at a period nearly contemporary with the organization of its sister townships, North Brunswick and South Amboy, South Brunswick formerly ranked in size with the largest townships in this section. Its area was reduced in 1872 by the formation from its territory of a portion of Cranbury. From its extreme eastern point to its extreme western point it measures about eleven miles. Its greatest length north and south is a little more than eight miles.

Civil List.—An act was passed by the Senate and General Assembly of New Jersey in 1841 authorizing the inhabitants of South Brunswick to vote by ballot at township-meetings. Previous to that date the voters met and appointed a moderator, who conducted the election by standing a candidate in a conspicuous place and demanding that such voters as were in favor of his election to a specified office should station themselves on a given side of the road, and those opposed to his being so elected upon the opposite side. The fate of the candidate was decided by an enumeration by the moderator of his adherents and opponents, and his choice or defeat was duly declared. This method of voting was locally known as "running off."

The following list of the freeholders representing South Brunswick from 1778 to 1881, inclusive, was extracted with much labor from the records of the Middlesex County board of chosen freeholders at New Brunswick:

David Williamson, 1778-85, 1788-91, 1793-97.	Dean Britton, 1841-46, 1850-54, 1859, 1863.
Joachim Gulick, 1780-82.	Thomas S. Snediker, 1843, 1844, 1851-54.
William Williamson, 1778.	John I. Davison, 1844-50, 1855, 1856, 1860-62, 1864, 1865.
James Abrahams, 1782.	Elias W. Conover, 1847-49.
John Wetherell, 1784, 1785, 1788.	Andrew McDowell, 1855-62, 1866.
John Wetherell, 1783, 1786-92.	William G. Bayles, 1857, 1858.
Andrew McDowell, 1793, 1794, 1798, 1799, 1800-10, 1812-24, 1827-35.	Elias Dey, 1863-68.
John Bailey, 1796, 1797.	James Scudder, 1867-70.
Christopher Longstreet, 1798, 1800, 1801.	Aaron Dean, 1869-72.

Samuel Gulick, 1825-30.	Frederick Farr, 1876.
Joseph McChesney, 1823, 1826.	John L. Saydam, 1877, 1878.
Isaac Storey, 1831-36.	David D. Applegate, 1878, 1879.
John T. McDowell, 1836-42.
Abraham Cruser, 1837-40.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

James Abrahams, of South Brunswick, is mentioned in the records of the board of chosen freeholders of Middlesex County as having been a justice of the peace in 1780. The old records of South Brunswick were burned with the house of Richard McDowell, then township clerk, in 1844, and the records covering the period 1844-54 have never been in the possession of the present clerk and their whereabouts is unknown. Therefore this civil list is as nearly complete as it can be made. The election of the following-named justices of the peace are duly recorded in such records as remain:

William A. Wakely, 1861-65.	Henry H. Stults, 1867.
Charles Shann, 1861-66.	William H. Bergen, 1870.
James Higgins, 1861, 1871-81.	James H. Wheeler, 1871.
James Van Nostrand, 1860.	James L. Ferris, 1873, 1878.
William Schenck, 1859.	Richard McDowell, 1874.
Samuel Higgins, 1866.	C. H. Stout, 1876.
William Hutchinson, 1866.	George I. McDowell, 1876.
William C. Clark, 1867-71.	C. L. Stout, 1881.

Educational.—Undoubtedly the first school in this township or south of New Brunswick, in the western part of Middlesex County, was that at Kingston. The early school history of that time-honored village is very imperfect. It is known that a church existed there in 1723, and it is fairly presumable that then or a little later there was a school connected with it. The first school-house of which any information can be obtained was built in the northern part of the present site of the village (in Somerset County) in 1776. Twenty years later it was torn down, and another was built in the southern part, in Middlesex County, which in 1831 was converted into a dwelling, and another erected about fifty yards from the site of the present school-house. The latter is a very neat structure, erected at a cost of five thousand dollars. There were early schools at Cross-Roads (now Dayton) and in the Rhode Hall neighborhood. At Dayton a new school-house was built by the railroad company to replace one which it was necessary to remove in constructing the present New York Division of the Pennsylvania Road through that hamlet.

Previous to the adoption of the provisions of the common school law the modus operandi of organizing schools in South Brunswick was for the trustees to canvass around the township among the heads of families, each of whom signed an agreement to send such a number of children to school as he or she had of the school age or could spare from home, and to pay a certain specified amount per scholar. The teachers boarded around, stopping a week more or less with each family who patronized his school. For a time the money voted at the annual township-meetings for school purposes and received from the surplus State fund was apportioned to the trustees to the heads of families, and by them paid to the teachers as tuition at so much per scholar, and afterwards it was paid by the trustees directly to the teachers and credited to the parents; but the present system did away with these and other inconvenient methods, which are recalled by the older residents simply as reminiscences of the days when the inhabitants of the township were struggling along under still more serious inconveniences than any connected with the schools.

The township is divided into twelve school districts, known as Six-Mile Run District, No. 40; Sand Hills District, No. 41; George's Road District, No. 42; Fresh Ponds District, No. 43; Ridge District, No. 44; Dayton District, No. 45; Rhode Hall District, No. 46; Mapleton District, No. 47; Little Rocky Hill District, No. 48; Scott's Corners District, No. 50; Pleasant Hill District, No. 51; and Kingston District, No. 55.

In 1852 the number of school districts was 17; number of children between five and eighteen, 1098; number of children taught, 640; average time schools were kept, 10 months; total amount appropriated for school purposes, $1692.28.

In 1880 the total amount received by the several school districts in South Brunswick from all sources for school purposes was as follows: In Districts Nos. 40, 41, 43, 44, 47, 48, 50, and 51, $300 each; in District No. 42, $412.09; in District No. 45, $440.18; in District No. 46, $460; and in District No. 55, $746.13. The value of school property in the township was $17,100, divided as follows among the several districts: Districts Nos. 40 and 45, $2000 each; District No. 41, $200; District No. 42, $1400; District No. 43, $400; Districts Nos. 44 and 50, $900 each; District No. 46, $1900; District No. 47, $1500; District No. 48, $600; District No. 51, $300; and District No. 55, $5000. The number of children in the township of the school age was 1189, of whom 89 belonged to District No. 40; 74 to District No. 41; 131 to District No. 42; 58 to District No. 43; 82 to District No. 44; 128 to District No. 45; 69 to District No. 46; 235 to District No. 55; 46 to District No. 47; 49 to District No. 48; and 64 each to Districts Nos. 50 and 51. It was estimated that 28 in the township attended private schools, and that 148 did not attend schools. Schools were kept open an average of ten months during the year, affording employment to one male and thirteen female teachers, the former at a monthly salary of $50, the latter at an average monthly salary of $28.30. District No. 41 has a school library of 41 volumes. Funds are being established in Districts Nos. 47 and 55 for the same purpose.

Industrial Pursuits.¹—AN ANCIENT GRIST-MILL.

—Gray's grist-mill, at Gray's Mills, on the Millstone, in the southwestern part of the township, is one of the successors of a mill which stood there, as is supposed, many years before the Revolution, and was for a time known as "Aqueduct Mill," on account of its proximity to an aqueduct carrying the Delaware and Raritan Canal over the Millstone River. The earliest proprietor of whom any knowledge can be gained was a man named Cooley, who was a pre-Revolutionary operator there. During the war the mill was burned, and soon afterwards was rebuilt by Cooley. After a while it was purchased by a man named Scudder, and later it had several successive owners until it was purchased by Dr. Hunt, who tore it down and rebuilt it, finally selling it to Alexander Gray, since whose death it has been owned by his widow.

THE DEAN MILL.—About 1810, Abraham Dean built a saw-mill at what is now Dean's Station, and carried on a lumbering business there until succeeded by his son Aaron, who conducted it about twenty years, when he was succeeded by his brother, Thomas Dean. From Thomas Dean the business passed to the latter's son, Aaron Dean, who erected a grist-mill adjacent to the saw-mill, and has continued the business to the present.

DISTILLERIES.—Samuel Combs had a distillery in the Fresh Ponds neighborhood in the latter part of the last century, which was probably the pioneer in its line. In 1852, John H. Martin established a distillery at Dean's Station, and soon sold it to William Hammell, who died in 1877, and was succeeded in the business by his son, James H. Hammell.

J. C. Powers has had a distillery just below Gray's Mills.

HAY-PRESSES.—Wheeler & Thomas erected a hay-press at Dean's Station in 1873, where they established a business, which, in 1875, they sold to S. I. Snediker. The machine has a capacity of six tons per day. The baled hay is shipped to New York. At Dayton a similar business was started by S. I. Snediker, which is now owned by the Reynolds Brothers.

MECHANICS' SHOPS.—At Plainsboro' are the wagon-shop of John E. Shultz (established in 1850) and the blacksmith-shop of William Wilson; at Gray's Mills Charles Williamson has a blacksmith-shop, and E. S. Williamson a wheelwright-shop. The blacksmith-shop of John Owens at Kingston was established in 1880, and the wheelwright-shop of J. W. Shann some years earlier. There is a blacksmith-shop at Dayton.

QUARRIES.—North of Mapletown on the river are some excellent quarries of freestone, a fine gray, with portions of no sandstone, streaked with small veins of quartz. It works well under the hammer, and was used in constructing the locks of the Delaware and Raritan Canal.

Between Gray's Mills and Kingston is a quarry where considerable stone has been taken out, and which is known as the Crusier quarry.

Burial-Places.—Much interest attaches to the first death, the first funeral, and the first grave in any locality. If settlement begun at an early date, the certainty that all earthly things have an end is strongly impressed on the mind of the wanderer in the old graveyard by the thought that the people who prepared the occupant of the first grave for burial, the man who made the first rude coffin, the man who dug the lonely grave, first opening Mother Earth in the vicinity for the reception of one of her children, the minister who officiated at the first funeral, the sorrowing friends who lowered the departed into his long home, the bereaved household, to whom that spot became an attraction that endeared the neighborhood to them during their lives, and every sympathetic or curious person who stood by, all lie in other graves around it or elsewhere, an old and weather-worn, often partially, sometimes wholly, illegible headstone, if there be one at all, being the only remaining evidence to any living person of the event which it commemorates.

The early graves were made on the lands of the settlers; the early coffins were roughly fashioned out of unsuitable material with few tools by unskilled hands; there were no plumed hearses, and the funerals were conducted without formality, often providing opportunity for the blunt and unconventional preachers of the early days to preach effective sermons, which would otherwise have fallen unheeded upon the callous ears of their auditors; for death had then been stripped of little of its awe, and by the pioneer preachers was literally brandished before the mental vision of their auditors as an admonition that the time for repentance was neither long nor certain. It is related of one stalwart circuit rider, with whom the settlers were long familiar, that on one occasion he said, "There's a certain class that won't come to preaching. My only chance at some of them is when I am addressing them as mourners at the funeral of some member of their family. When I do get them there where they can't leave I make the best of my opportunity." This may have been taking an unfair advantage, and it is an open question whether much grace and mercy and charity was inculcated in that way; but perhaps the dominie was honest in his intent, and has long since received his reward accordingly.

It was not an uncommon thing for a man to save a few good boards of suitable wood for years, with the design of having his coffin made out of them, and there have been instances related, one at least of an early resident of South Brunswick, of men's making their own coffins and putting them carefully away until they should be needed. The earliest burials were made near the houses of the settlers, and all traces of the graves have long since disappeared from view. Many who have died in the township have from an early date been buried at Cranbury and in the cemetery at Kingston, on the north side of the road forming the county line at that place, and consequently in Somerset County.

In the graveyard of the Baptist Church at Dayton are about one hundred graves visible, many having doubtless become indistinguishable. There are many graves entirely unmarked; some are marked with wooden headboards, and others with headstones, the inscriptions on which are in various degrees of legibility. The oldest of the latter is that of John T., son of Samuel and Mary Ann Disbrow, who died Feb. 23, 1854.

There is an old burying-ground at Fresh Ponds, the inscriptions on some of the headstones there being undecipherable. It covers an area of about three-quarters of an acre, and there are about thirty graves to be seen. The oldest legible memorial here is as follows: "In memory of Farrand Jacobs, who departed this life in the full hope of a glorious immortality, May 24th, 1844."

Villages and Hamlets.—KINGSTON, three miles northeast of Princeton, at the intersection of the old New York and Philadelphia turnpike with the Delaware and Raritan Canal, is a station on the Rocky Hill Railroad, located mostly in Franklin township (Somerset County), a small portion in South Brunswick, and its western extremity in Princeton township (Mercer County), and contains five hundred inhabitants, a school-house, two churches, two hotels, a sash and blind factory, a lumber-yard, a blacksmith-shop and wheelwright-shop, some stores, and a goodly number of dwellings. Here was one of the earliest settlements in the country around about, and it is stated that there was a church there as early as 1723, and considered probable that a school was opened there at a date not much later.

Vantilburgh's inn, which stood in Somerset County, on the north side of the road dividing that county at that point from Middlesex County, was long known as the favorite stopping-place of Washington and the Governors of New Jersey in passing from the eastern towns to the State capital.

It was at this village that Washington, with the American troops, eluded the British on the day of the battle of Princeton by filing off to the left at the church, down the narrow road leading to Rocky Hill, while the enemy in pursuit, supposing he had gone to New Brunswick to destroy their winter stores, kept on the main road.

The old Withington tavern, now known as the Kingston House, was built previous to 1776, its earliest occupant, so far as is known, having been Phineas Withington. Before the era of railroads Kingston was on the great thoroughfare between New York and Philadelphia, and it is related that the stage travel was so large between the two cities that forty-nine stages loaded with passengers have halted at the same time at Withington's, four hundred harnessed horses standing before the house. Those must have been lively times in Kingston, and since then some of its citizens may be pardoned if they have sighed in idle hours for "the good old days" of bustle, activity, and excitement which have long been signally lacking there, the place having settled down to the usual monotonous every-day experiences of other villages of its size. "Mine host" Withington is spoken of as having been a very popular landlord, who did his utmost to please his guests, having a sufficiency for all in both larder and cellar, and a private fish-pond, which he constructed at considerable expense in order to furnish his table with "trout right out of the water," as he expressed it. Some of his descendants are now prominent residents and property-owners at Kingston. The old house, many times repaired and renovated, having passing through the hands of numerous landlords, is now, under its modern name, kept by J. B. Titus.

That portion of Kingston lying within the borders of South Brunswick contains the stores of Cornelius Van Duyn, postmaster, and C. B. Moore, the Kingston House, the school-house belonging to District No. 55, and a few dwellings.

The post-office was in the Somerset County part of the village until 1870, when Cornelius Van Duya was appointed postmaster, succeeding C. B. Moore, and removed it across the line into Middlesex County.

Andrew Rowland

The first merchant in Kingston, in South Brunswick, was Joseph C. Higgins, who opened a store there in 1867. Mr. C. B. Moore formerly had a store in the northern part of the village, and removed to the South Brunswick side of the road a few years ago. Higgins was not long in trade, and Ezra De Hart, P. Robinson, James Gray, and a man named Thorne each had stores there for a short time.

MAPLETOWN, which received its name from the Maple family formerly resident there, is a somewhat ancient hamlet on the "straight" turnpike from Trenton to New Brunswick, now nearly connected with Kingston by a continuation of dwellings. Gordon mentions it in his "Gazetteer," published in 1832, as follows: "A hamlet on Millstone River, a short distance above the mouth of Stony Brook, two miles southeast of Princeton and fifteen miles from New Brunswick, containing a fine grist-mill and saw-mill and fulling-mill, and four or five dwellings."

DAYTON, formerly known as Cross-Roads, is situated about a quarter of a mile from the New York Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, southeast of the centre of the township, at the intersection of the Kingston road, the Plainsboro' road, and the Rhode Hall road with the New Brunswick and Cranbury turnpike, and was named in honor of William L. Dayton, of Trenton, the change having been necessitated by the frequent miscarriage of mails intended for that locality, there being another post-office in the State called Cross-Roads. Mr. Dayton, who was attorney for the railroad company at the time of the construction of the line, had favored the citizens by securing them, at the railroad company's expense, a new school-house in place of an old one which it was necessary to move in order to clear the way for the track-layers, and later contributed liberally towards building the Presbyterian Church there.

The first public-house at Dayton was kept by James Whitlock as early as 1750, and after a time sold to John Barricklo, who occupied it many years, during which it was known as the Barricklo tavern. Of Barricklo William L. Schenck bought it and kept it about thirty years, and was succeeded by his son, William B. Schenck, who remodeled the building for use as a dwelling, and later converted a portion of it into a store. Thomas Wetherell built a public-house at Dayton during the latter part of the last century, and kept a tavern there until 1817 or 1818, when he died, and was succeeded by his daughter, Mrs. Ann McDowell. The tavern many times changed hands until 1880, when it passed into the possession of Frederick Farr, the present occupant. The Exchange Hotel was built by its present proprietor, Abraham Terhune, in 1860.

The first store at the Cross-Roads was kept by Mrs. Abigail Van Pelt. It was a small concern, and the stock of no particular kind of merchandise was at all extensive, but there were many kinds, including whisky, and it is said "Mother" Van Pelt was able to furnish a customer with about anything that could by any possibility be required. A still earlier store stood on the New Brunswick and Cranbury turnpike, south of the Corners, the name of whose proprietor cannot be learned. W. B. Schenck kept a store in the old Barricklo tavern building for some years, and was succeeded by J. C. Vanderveer and others. Thomas W. Schenck has had a store in the village about thirty years, during the past few years in the old Barricklo building. George F. Vanderveer has been a merchant there since 1877.

J. C. Vanderveer, insurance agent, is, and for a number years has been, postmaster. The village contains two stores, two churches, a school-house, a blacksmith- and wheelwright-shop, a hay-pressing establishment, and thirty-five dwellings.

DEAN'S STATION, on the New York Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, is a hamlet on the New Brunswick and Cranbury turnpike and near the headwaters of Lawrence's Brook, in the northern part of the township. The locality was early known as "Dean's," in honor of Abraham Dean, who built a saw-mill there in 1810, and was a prominent business man there until succeeded by other members of his family. About 1845, John H. Martin had built several houses and opened a store there, and from that time onward until after the erection of the depot and the establishment of a regular railway station there to supersede a flag-station the hamlet was known as Martinsville, and by some is so called to this day; but when the station was opened the railroad company named it Dean's Station, and from it the hamlet received the name by which it is commonly known.

John H. Martin had several successors in the mercantile business, one after another, and his former store has been occupied since 1878 by William A. Wines, and is owned by Samuel Giles. Besides the store the place contains a distillery, a hay-pressing establishment, and twelve dwellings. Formerly there was a blacksmith's shop.

PLAINSBO'RO'.—This hamlet is located on the line between South Brunswick and Cranbury, on the Princeton turnpike, and contains a hotel, two stores, a blacksmith's shop, a wheelwright-shop, two churches, and a number of dwellings.

The Plainsboro' tavern was erected about 1800, and the first occupant of whom any information is obtainable was Mrs. Mary Gulick, who perhaps was the successor there of a deceased husband. About 1820 the stand passed into other hands, and the changes of proprietors and occupants have been frequent. The present landlord is Arthur Ruding. John D. Van Doren is a merchant, and has for a year been postmaster. Another merchant is William Schooley.

GRAY'S MILLS, at the western extremity of South Brunswick, on Millstone River, and near the aqueduct of the Delaware and Raritan Canal, is a hamlet of six houses, named in honor of Alexander Gray, and was settled before the Revolution, its nucleus having been the ancient grist-mill elsewhere referred to. Besides the mill there are in the settlement a wheelwright-shop and a blacksmith-shop.

MONMOUTH JUNCTION.—This is a hamlet containing a church, a store and post-office, a hotel, a railway station, and fourteen dwellings, located on the New York Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, at its junction with the Jamesburg and Freehold Railroad and the Rocky Hill extension of the same. The first merchant was Stryker Rowland. The only store now is that of H. B. Groves, opened in 1879. The first postmaster was Charles O. Greggs, about 1878; the present is H. B. Groves.

The first and only public-house was built in 1871, by John H. Martin, and was occupied by John Shreeve until 1876. At the latter date James S. Higgins bought the property, and has since conducted the business.

FRANKLIN PARK.—The above is the name of a hamlet of twenty dwellings, more or less, a hotel, a school-house, and a store and post-office, at the northern limit of the township, and partially in Somerset County. The store is kept by C. C. Beekman, who is also postmaster.

FRESH PONDS.—A hamlet of a dozen houses, a church, and a school-house, known variously as Pigeon Swamp, Woodville, Woodside, and Fresh Ponds, is located at a cross-roads in the northeast part of the township. It has been long called as above, on account of the proximity in former years of several marshy ponds, known collectively as "Pigeon Swamp," since partially drained by an improvement called the "Great Ditch."

RHODE HALL is a neighborhood on the boundary line between Monroe and South Brunswick, and contains a store, a hotel, and several dwellings. It is an old settlement, the early residents having been several Scotch families, some of the descendants of whom have risen to distinction in various walks of life.

The nucleus of the settlement was an old tavern, formerly known as the "Half-way House," which was often a scene of much activity in the old staging days, and was first kept, probably as early as 1730, by David Williamson, who gave the locality its name. Williamson was succeeded by Thomas McDowell about 1774. A public-house is now kept at Rhode Hall by John Smock, who succeeded his father, Simmons Smock, as landlord at the latter's death. A race-course, known as the Rhode Hall Driving Park, was made there.

Churches.—THE BETHEL METHODIST CHURCH OF PLAINSBORO'.—This church was erected by subscription in 1812, the land on which it stands having been donated to a Methodist society then formed in the neighborhood by Robert Davison, Jr. (a zealous Methodist), with the provision that in case the church to be built thereon at any time ceased to belong to and be used by the Methodist denomination, the lot should revert to him, his heirs, or his legal representatives.

The first preacher who held meetings in the building is reasonably supposed to have been Rev. Joseph Totten, who closed his labors there about 1814 or 1815. Much aid towards the erection of the church was rendered by Mr. Davison, in the hope of establishing a Methodist Church there. This hope was never realized, though the few Methodists in the vicinity have maintained a class organization to the present, thus retaining the control of the house of worship, which has been used by all Christian denominations irregularly, without aiding to form a church of any sect in the neighborhood. In course of time it became dilapidated and was unserviceable for a number of years. It was repaired and reopened in 1850, and has been kept up by contributions from people in the vicinity, prominent among whom was Mrs. Charlotte Zeff, a granddaughter of the giver of the lot.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH OF DAYTON.—The ground upon which stands the Baptist Church at Dayton was deeded to the trustees of the Baptist Church of Dayton by William Jones, and services were first held in the church in 1848, immediately after its completion, by Rev. Jacob Gessner. The last pastor was Rev. Morgau Cox, who severed his connection with it in 1874.

The church is located on the New Brunswick and Cranbury turnpike, opposite the Presbyterian Church, and is a wooden building forty-five feet by thirty-three. Prior to the erection of the Presbyterian Church the Presbyterians held frequent meetings in it.

A legal organization is preserved, and the present trustees are James Higgins, Andrew Rowland, N. B. Guire, and Charles Groves. No records of this church are known to be in existence.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF DAYTON.—One of the numerous outlying stations of the Cranbury pastors was Dayton, where a regular service was maintained for some time previous to the organization of the Presbyterian Church there. About 1867, as the result of prayer-meetings and exhortations, there was a religious awakening that led to many conversions, and soon afterward the demand for a church organization became apparent.

Oct. 16, 1869, the Presbytery of New Brunswick organized a church at Dayton with the following-named members (fifty-eight in number): Richard McDowell, Abbie McDowell, Thomas W. Schenck, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Schenck, William B. Schenck, Mrs. Emmeline Schenck, John C. Vanderveer, Mrs. John C. Vanderveer, William Dean, Mrs. Jane Dean, Rufus Conover, Mrs. Caroline Conover, George W. Schenck, Mrs. Mary Ann Schenck, William B. Miller, Mrs. Mary J. Miller, Daniel D. Applegate, Mrs. Roxannah Applegate, Peter Rogers, Mrs. Parmelia Rogers, Mrs. Elizabeth Perrine, Mrs. Margaret Higgins, Charles Everett, Mrs. Julia Ann Everett, Mrs. Sarah F. Burlew, Mrs. Elizabeth Rowland, Mrs. Eliza Ann Conover, Miss Celia J. Conover, Mrs. Harriet N. Anderson, Miss Louisa Anderson, John McDowell, Mrs. Adeline H. McDowell, Addison H. McDowell, Mrs. Sarah Terhune, Cornelia J. Stults, John P. Stults, Andrew B. McDowell, Mrs. Matilda McDowell, Mrs. Rachel Griggs, Mrs. Mary I. Grover, Anne McDonald, Daniel Davison, Mrs. Mattie Davison, Isaac B. Rowland, Mrs. Catharine Higgins, Mrs. Mary E. Anderson, Mrs. Mary A. S. Hagerman, Jacob W. Hagerman, Sarah S. Van Dorne, Mrs. John H. Allendorph, Benjamin Miller, Mrs. Benjamin Miller, Andrew Rowland, Ann Van Pelt, Mrs. Adeline Robbins, Louise Rowland, and Mrs. Ellen Soden.

Forty-six of these constituent members were from the two churches at Cranbury. Those churches having reached the critical period of "full and flourishing," the pastors and people fully agreed to give the new enterprise a hearty godspeed and substantial assistance. Two consequences followed: the young church started self-sustaining, and in six months more than twice as many had been added to the parent churches as they had dismissed.

The elders chosen at the organization of the church and now in service are Richard McDowell, Thomas W. Schenck, John W. Hagerman, and Lewis Rowland.

For a time the pulpit was supplied by Rev. J. H. Schofield. In May, 1870, Rev. J. W. Hubbard was installed first pastor. In December, 1875, Rev. A. Westveer was installed. The present pastor, Rev. S. J. Rowland, was installed in July, 1880.

Early meetings were held in the Baptist Church. The erection of a house of worship had been begun prior to the organization, which was completed and dedicated in August, 1870. A parsonage was built the same year. The house of worship is located north of the centre of the village, and with the other property vested in the church is valued at about ten thousand dollars.

THE CHURCH AT MONMOUTH JUNCTION.—A frame church was erected at Monmouth Junction in 1879 by James Hunt, which is often referred to as the Methodist Church, but is devoted to the use of all Christian denominations.

"THE OLD CHURCH," PLAINSBORO'.—In Plainsboro', on a hill near the school-house, stands the "Old Church" (bearing date 1779). It is the first house of worship of an organization of that name and date, and chooses to be called the "Old Church" as claiming a primitive simplicity in its beliefs. A second "Old Church" is forming in Princeton, where already a still larger building has been put up. These organizations are under the care of Rev. John Miller, who by the action of his Presbytery was obliged to withdraw from the Presbyterian body for difference of doctrine. He makes no attempt to join any other denomination, but prefers a Presbyterian order, only he decrees that morality has dropped out too much from the teachings of religion.¹

THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH OF FRESH PONDS.—At Fresh Ponds is an old wooden church, which was erected many years ago, and had served as a mission church under the auspices of the Methodist Protestant denomination, meetings having formerly been held there once a week, and later semi-monthly. During the past few years there have been no regular services.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

WILLIAM G. BAYLES.

John Bayles, the grandfather of the subject of this biography, was of English birth, and resided in Somerset County, N. J. He was united in marriage to a Miss Davidson, and had children,—Robert, Samuel, John, Rachel, and Susan. His wife having died, he married a second time a Mrs. Bergen, to whom were born several children.

The death of Mr. Bayles occurred about the year 1820. Robert, one of his sons, was born in South Brunswick, and during a portion of his life resided in Somerset County. He later removed to the township of his birth, where his death occurred.

He married Rebecca, daughter of Maj. John Gulick, and had children,—William G., Susan A. (Mrs. Dr. Dunn), George, James, Margaretta M., Emma (Mrs. William McCauley), Maria E., John G., a physician, and Alexander.

Their son, William G., was born Nov. 9, 1802, in Somerset County (now Mercer County), and spent his boyhood with his parents. After a brief residence at Princeton, N. J., the family removed to Kingston, Middlesex Co., when William G. was sent to Lawrenceville, and later to Princeton, to pursue his studies.

On his return he for a while assisted his father, and also became interested in a line of stages running between Philadelphia and New York, and known as the Union Line.

(1) There is no Trinity. The one personal God is incarnate in Christ, and is the Holy Ghost.

(2) There is no child not of Adam. Christ was made sinless by the power of His Godhead through the grace of His intended sacrifice.

(3) There is no grace not moral. Faith is a moral grace, and it is the eye of conscience that is opened to believing.

(4) There is no imputed obedience. Christ's sufferings are imputed, and it is an obedience of our own that is the fruit of our redemption.

(5) There is no perseverance promised in conversion. Election unto life is of those who endure unto the end.

(6) There are no disembodied souls. Men die in death, and wake in the resurrection.

He was married on the 24th of September, 1827, to Miss Sarah, daughter of Judge Frederick Cruser, of Rocky Hill, Somerset Co., N. J., and had children,—Robert, who is president of the Market National Bank of New York City; Martha, George A., Frederick C., William H., and Westley H., all the sons with the exception of George A. being residents of New York City. The death of Mrs. Bayles occurred April 22, 1877.

Mr. Bayles is in his political sympathies a Republican, and has always been a strong advocate of the principles of his party. He has served as freeholder of his township, and held various minor offices, but has neither sought nor desired such honors.

He has officiated as director of the Princeton National Bank, as did also his father. He has been for years identified with the educational interests of the township, and filled the office of trustee of the public school of the district where he resides.

His religious sympathies are with the Presbyterian denomination, the church at Kingston having numbered him among its worshippers and its board of trustees.

PETER CORTELYOU.

The Cortelyou family (sometimes written Cortileau) are of French extraction, the progenitor in America having been Jaques Cortelyou, who arrived in New Amsterdam (now New York) about 1651, together with his wife, Neltje Van Duyn, she being also of French lineage. His children were Jaques, Peter, Cornelius, William, Helena, and Maria.

In a direct line of descent from Jaques Cortelyou was Henry, father of the subject of this sketch, who was born in 1761, and married to Elizabeth Nevius, whose birth occurred in 1762. The death of Henry Cortelyou took place March 14, 1841, and that of his wife Jan. 22, 1848. Their only son, Peter, was born Sept. 27, 1796, in the township of South Brunswick, where his youth was spent upon the farm of his father. At a later period he removed to New York, and began mercantile life as a clerk. He continued business in Griggstown, but ultimately returned to the farm, which became his by inheritance on the death of his father. Here he followed agricultural employments during the remainder of his life, the homestead being still occupied by his son.

Mr. Cortelyou was married Sept. 23, 1820, to Miss Mary Ann, daughter of Cornelius Gulick, of Ten-Mile Run, Middlesex Co. Their children are Elizabeth, born Aug. 25, 1821; Henry P., whose birth occurred Dec. 4, 1823, and two who died in early childhood. Mrs. Cortelyou's death took place Sept. 21, 1831, and he was again married on the 21st of November, 1844, to Miss Julia Ann, daughter of Garret Beekman, of Griggstown. They had one son, Peter, above mentioned as the owner of the paternal estate.

Mr. Cortelyou was in politics a Republican, having during the late civil war abandoned the principles of the Democracy which he had formerly espoused. He was for many years freeholder of the township, and held other less important offices. He was for a long period an active and exemplary member of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, Franklin Park, and one of its liberal supporters. The death of Peter Cortelyou occurred Aug. 25, 1879, in his eighty-third year. His life was a bright example of integrity and purity of character, and won for him the respect of all who were associated with him.

I. CHANDLER WITHINGTON.

Mr. Withington is descended from an old New England family, the progenitor of whom was Elder Henry Withington, of Dorchester, Mass., who emigrated from England in 1635, the subject of this biographical sketch having represented the eighth generation of the family. During the early settlement of Dorchester, which was the third Puritan colony (Plymouth being the first and Salem the second), the Withingtons appear prominent in affairs of church and State, and were allied by marriage to many of the older New England families. Phineas Withington, the father of Isaac Chandler, was born April 13, 1790, at Jamaica Plain, now Roxbury, Mass., and in 1810, when twenty years of age, came to Kingston, Middlesex Co., N. J. He was well known as one of the proprietors of the old Union Stage Line, running between New York and Philadelphia, which was afterwards merged into the Camden and Amboy Railroad, and controlled that portion of the route between New Brunswick and Kingston. He was, Oct. 26, 1815, united in marriage to Miss Sarah, daughter of Henry and Margaret (Skillman) Gulick, of Kingston, N. J. Phineas Withington was a man of indomitable energy and enterprise, and added greatly by his extensive business connections to the growth and prosperity of the village of his residence. He was to his family a kind protector, to the poor a steadfast friend, and to the community generally a valuable citizen. His death occurred Nov. 21, 1834, at the early age of forty-four years.

His son, Isaac Chandler, was the second of four children,—Amanda B., Isaac C., Henry G., and Hiram R. He was born at Kingston, Jan. 29, 1820, and was but fourteen years of age at the time of his father's decease.

His early years were spent in school at Burlington, N. J., after which he became a clerk in the post-office at Princeton, N. J., and later assistant postmaster at Trenton, N. J.

On the death of his mother, in 1842, he purchased the interest of his brothers and sisters in the homestead farm, and devoted his energies to agricultural pursuits. On the 18th of September, 1844, he was married to Miss Maria Roshore, daughter of George W. and Eliza Roshore Platt, of New York City. He entered into business relations with Mr. Platt, which were continued until the death of the latter, in 1881. In 1850, the State of New Jersey having purchased the land embraced in the homestead farm with a view to locating a House of Refuge, Mr. Withington removed to New York, and made the city his permanent residence. The project was, however, abandoned in 1852, and he repurchased the property, added to its dimensions, and in 1857 erected a spacious and elegant mansion surrounded by broad avenues and expansive lawns.

The cultivation and improvement of this property was a source of great pleasure to Mr. Withington, and the summer months were invariably spent on his country estate. He was a thorough, practical, careful, and intelligent farmer, and eager to avail himself of all the modern appliances which added to the success of his efforts.

He cared little for public honors, was unostentatious in his life, and while high-minded and sensitive in his nature, was invariably courteous and genial in his bearing. These qualities, added to an unusually distinguished physique and a certain quality of personal magnetism, rendered his presence always commanding and impressive.

He affiliated in religion with the Presbyterian denomination, and was for many years identified with the Presbyterian Church of Kingston, N. J.

Mr. and Mrs. Withington were the parents of four sons and four daughters, the eldest of whom was George Platt, who died at the age of five years. The survivors are Charles Sumner, who graduated at Princeton College in the class of 1868, was admitted to the New York bar in 1871, and is now in active practice; Laura Elliott, Annie Louise, Irving Platt, who graduated at Princeton in 1880; Chandler, who graduates during the present year from the John E. Green School of Science, Princeton College; Marea Roshore, and Eliza Platt. The death of Mr. Withington occurred Nov. 22, 1881, in his sixty-second year, at his residence in New York. His remains were interred in the family plot in Greenwood Cemetery.

THOMAS S. SNEDEKER.

Garret Snedeker came from Long Island about 1766 and settled in South Brunswick township, Middlesex County, N. J., where he became the possessor of several hundred acres of land. He was a man of quite large means and influence, and was known as "Gentleman Garret." He was an elder in the Presbyterian church at Cranbury, and in his will, dated 1791, he left £150 to the theological seminary at Princeton, and divided the balance of his property among his children. He died Aug. 1, 1825. His wife, by whom he had issue, was Margaret, sister of Col. David Chambers, who served in the Revolutionary war.

She was born Feb. 23, 1746, and died May 9, 1791. His children were Alexander, Abram, Rose, Isaac, Maria, and Craige. The third son, Isaac, was born Oct. 2, 1782. He succeeded to a part of the homestead, and was a farmer during his active business life. He died in Cranbury, Feb. 22, 1862, where he retired after leaving his farm. He was a ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church at Cranbury for twenty-four years. His wife, Anne Salter, bore him children,—Getty, wife of Dominicus Mershon; Garret, resides in Washington. S. R., Thomas Salter; and Margaret Chambers, who became the wife of James Buckalew, of Jamesburg.

Thomas Salter, second son of Isaac Snedeker, is the subject of our sketch, and was born on the homestead, June 9, 1809. He succeeded to that part of the homestead called the "Bennett tract," containing some four hundred acres, partly by purchase and partly by inheritance, which has remained the homestead since. As a farmer, a merchant at New Brunswick, and a large dealer in timber, he spent an active business life. He was a man of good judgment, sterling integrity, and unsolicitous of public place or the emoluments of office. He was an active and influential member of the Whig and Republican parties, a zealous supporter of the Union cause in the late civil war, and during the war and for three years afterwards he filled the place of revenue assessor and inspector. Then he was succeeded by his son Isaac, who held the office until a change was made in the district. He was a deacon in the Baptist Church at Hightstown for thirteen years, was one of the founders of Peddie Institute of that place, and for a time a member of its board of trustees, and he was frequently selected to administer upon estates. He died Aug. 3, 1868.

His wife was Sarah Stryker, a daughter of John I. Bergen and Mary Mershon, of Cranbury. She is a descendant in the seventh generation from Hans Hansen Bergen, a native of Bergen, Norway, who removed to Holland, and came to New Amsterdam in 1633. Her great-grandfather, George Bergen, in 1720 settled from Long Island upon a plantation in Middlesex County, N. J., which, with its families of negroes, descended to his son, John B. Bergen, who was born March 27, 1739, and died June 2, 1808; served with the Jersey Blues in the Revolutionary war, and was wounded at the battle of Princeton. John B. Bergen had for his insignia of office a long staff with a spear and slender battle-axe attached, which he preserved during his life. Mrs. Thomas S. Snedeker survives in 1882. Her children are Mary A., wife of Austin I. Richardson, residing upon a part of the homestead; Sarah E., wife of R. Baxter Konover, of Trenton; Emeline, wife of Abigail Chamberlin, residing upon a part of the homestead; Isaac S., a grain and hay merchant and farmer at Dayton, N. J., and a manufacturer of edge-tools at Newark, N. J., married Miss Mamie Ten Broeck; and the youngest child, Willard, who died at the age of nine years.

ANDREW ROWLAND.

The Rowlands, as elsewhere stated, are of French extraction, the subject of this biographical sketch being the great-grandson of James Rowland and his wife, Letty Guest. Among their children was William, born March 13, 1780, and married to Miss Catherine Stryker, who had eleven children, among whom was James, born in New Brunswick and married to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew McDowell, of South Brunswick. Their children were William, Andrew, Adeline (Mrs. Robbins), Catherine, Richard, and Charles. William resides in Brooklyn, while Charles and Richard are residents of Dayton, N. J. Andrew was born Sept. 28, 1829, on the homestead farm at present occupied by Stryker Rowland. The village of Dayton afforded him the earliest advantages of education, after which he removed to Brooklyn, and acquired the trade of a ship-joiner. This business he carried on for a number of years successfully, in connection with his brother William, in New York and Brooklyn.

Having a taste for country life and the labors of the agriculturist, he removed to South Brunswick in 1864, and has since followed farming pursuits. He was married Oct. 20, 1853, to Miss Mary F., daughter of James Foster, of Brooklyn, where he followed the trade of a ship-joiner, his father having been a ship-captain. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Rowland are James Andrew, born Aug. 2, 1854; Sarah L. (Mrs. Harvey B. Groves), born May 10, 1856; William F., born May 28, 1864; Clarence S., whose birth occurred Aug. 18, 1867; and Sylvester Hill, born Oct. 6, 1873. The death of Mrs. Rowland occurred March 30, 1881. Her memory is tenderly cherished by a devoted husband and children. In politics Mr. Rowland may be classed in the ranks of the Republicans, though he takes but little interest in the conflicts of party, and has never sought official position.

He is a Presbyterian, and one of the founders of the church at Dayton, of which he was formerly a trustee and is now an elder. Mrs. Rowland was a member of the First Church at Green Point.

STRYKER ROWLAND.

The name of Rowland is intimately associated with French history, and it is probable that the ancestors of Stryker Rowland were of French descent. His grandfather, James Rowland, was born Aug. 18, 1755, and married to Miss Letty Guest, whose birth occurred Jan. 12, 1756. Their children were Elizabeth, William, Catharine, James, Charles, Letty, Sarah, Richard, John, and Susannah.

William, the second of these children in the order of birth, was born March 13, 1780, in New Brunswick, and later removed to Penn's Neck, Mercer Co., where he was a popular landlord, and also engaged in carting for the government during the war of 1812. He subsequently became a resident of South Brunswick and engaged in farming occupations. He married Miss Catharine Stryker, and had children,—Elizabeth S., James, William, Letty A., Charles S., Lewis D., William (second), Adeline, Richard, Catherine, and Stryker. Mr. Rowland was a man of strong force of character and of exceptional ability. He was a lifelong Democrat, participated actively in public affairs, and held for years the office of justice of the peace of the township. His death occurred July 26, 1857, in his seventy-eighth year, and that of his wife Jan. 31, 1845, in her sixty-sixth year.

Their son Stryker was born Oct. 25, 1818, and after obtaining the rudiments of an education at the village school at Dayton, in the township, engaged in agricultural employments on the farm of his father, which is still occupied by him, and known as the Long Bridge farm.

He was married to Miss Ann, daughter of Isaac Bogert, of South Brunswick, on the 25th of April, 1841. Their children are Isaac B., born in 1843; James E., whose birth occurred in 1847; and Anne E. (Mrs. Philip H. Allendorf), born in 1850. Isaac has two children,—Anne J. and Charles S.; James has one daughter, Ella D.; and Mrs. Allendorf has two daughters, Nettie S. and Millie L. Mr. Rowland has always been a strong Democrat in his political predilections, and though not in any sense a politician, has been for several years postmaster of Monmouth Junction. He has devoted himself during his lifetime to farming employments. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church at Dayton, Mrs. Rowland having been a member of the church of the same denomination at Cranbury.

JOHN STRYKER CRUSER.

The family of Crusers originally settled on Staten Island, where Abraham Cruser, grandfather of John Stryker, resided. He was born June 1, 1733, and married to Martha Doolhagen, the ceremony having been performed by Rev. Mr. Eaton on the 5th of April, 1758. Their children were Helena, born in 1759; Rachel, in 1761; Martha, in 1764; Frederick, in 1766; Cornelius, in 1769; and John, in 1778. Abraham Cruser removed at a later period to the family property, which was partly inherited by his wife, and the remainder purchased by him. He served in the war of the Revolution, and was active in preventing the landing of the British off Sandy Hook. He was an influential citizen, and accumulated a fortune in farming pursuits.

His death occurred April 2, 1819, in his eighty-sixth year. His son John was born July 24, 1778, and was married to Cornelia, daughter of John Stryker, on the 14th of February, 1797, by Rev. Samuel Snowden, of Princeton. Their children were Abraham, born May 5, 1798; John Stryker, whose birth occurred Sept. 25, 1799, deceased; John Stryker (2d), born Oct. 26, 1800; Cornelia (Mrs. Voorhees), born Feb. 8, 1803; James McRee, born July 7, 1804; Jaquish V., Aug. 13, 1806; Frederick, Feb. 14, 1808; Van Cleef, Feb. 13, 1810; Catherine, May 11, 1811.

John Cruser died April 5, 1816, and the death of his wife occurred Jan. 28, 1852. Their son, John Stryker, who is the subject of this sketch, remained upon the homestead until his twenty-eighth year, after which, having sold his portion of the property to his brother, he removed to his present residence and continued farming occupations. He has been during his lifetime a strong Democrat and a firm party adherent. He received the appointment of judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and declined the honor, but has served as justice of the peace, and held other township offices. He has been largely identified with county politics, and exercised no small influence on the annual elections. The Cruser family have always been identified with the religious interests of the community. Abraham Cruser assisted in rebuilding the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton, and John Stryker Cruser was formerly a member of the Kingston Presbyterian Church, and one of its trustees, and a member of its building committee. He is now associated with the Second Presbyterian Church of Princeton.

CHAPTER CI.

MONROE.

Situation and Boundaries.—Monroe is the southernmost township in Middlesex County, and is bounded north by East Brunswick, east by Madison and Manalapan (Monmouth County), south by Manalapan (Monmouth County) and East Windsor (Mercer County), and west by Cranbury and South Brunswick.

Natural Features.—Like most of the stretch of country south of the Raritan, between New York and Philadelphia, the surface of Monroe is rolling. The soil is measurably productive, and contains clayey and sandy loam in considerable quantities. It is watered centrally by the Manalapan Creek, and along a portion of its eastern border by Matchaponix Creek, which unite at its northern extremity, forming South River. These streams were so named by the Indians in description of the country through which they flow as it was regarded by them, manalapan signifying a good country producing good bread, and matchaponix poor land not producing anything out of which good bread may be made. At Jamesburg the Manalapan affords a fine water-power, which was first utilized in the latter half of the eighteenth century. The southern part is drained by Cranbury Brook, which has its source in Cedar Brook and other small streams in Monroe, traverses Cranbury township centrally, and near its western limit flows into Millstone River. The Camden and Amboy Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad crosses the northwestern part of the township, forming a junction at Jamesburg with the Freehold and Jamesburg Railroad, and the extension of the latter to Monmouth Junction in South Brunswick.

The area of Monroe is 22,000 acres. In 1880 its real estate was valued at $1,029,000; its personal property at $895,200; the total taxable valuation being $1,129,000. The voters numbered 635. The county tax was $6815; the school tax, $2237. In 1840, two years after its organization, its population was 2453, and ten years later it was 3004. In 1880 it was 3016.

Early Settlement and Pioneer Life.²—In colonial days, when the first settlements were made in this vicinity of which we now find any mention, New Jersey was divided into the provinces of East and West Jersey, and the Duke of York, under date of March 14, 1682, had confirmed the sale of the province of East Jersey to the twenty-four proprietors, including James, the Earl of Perth, and Robert Barclay, from whom the title to a part of Edmund Rue's farm was acquired, with only three intermediate changes. The representatives of the proprietors appear to have been very active in disseminating favorable accounts of this section, and the first settlers were very enthusiastic in their descriptions of their new homes and prospects.

Further inducements were made by the proprietors in 1684, granting fifty acres to each head of a family settling in the province, and twenty-five acres for each of the other members of his household. Under this provision James Johnstone came from Edinburgh in December, 1685, and settled on the southeastern bank of the Manalapan, near Spottswood, and within the present borders of Monroe. He soon purchased additional land, extending towards the Matchaponix, and was doubtless the first person to reclaim land in the township.

A little later William Davison, son of Robert Davison, also from Scotland, settled on a tract of land commencing about two hundred feet southeast of the residence of Isaac S. Buckelew, in Jamesburg, extending beyond Daniel R. Schenck's and including most of the land now known as the Davison tract. His descendants have been numerous, and have done much towards improving the land and advancing the agricultural interests of that vicinity. His nephew,³ Paul Davison, who died seven or eight years ago, was well known, and the widow of his son, William W.

² In the preparation of this chapter, as elsewhere, the historian has, by permission, made free use of the historical address delivered by T. Wilton Hill, Esq., at Jamesburg, July 4, 1876.

Davison, the venerable Sarah Davison, is still living in the family of the late Abram S. Davison, of which her grandson, Peter V. Davison, is the nominal head. Abram S. Davison and his sisters, Nancy, Margaret, and Rebecca, were children of William W. Davison. Abram S. married a daughter of Peter Voorhees. His children, Peter V., Benjamin D., Isaac S., William H., Sarah V., and Anna M., are all living at and near Jamesburg.

The letters written by the first settlers to their friends at home describing the country and offering inducements for the latter to follow them were quaintly interesting. The following is a specimen:

"Wolves are so far from troubling men, that if a man should lay a glove upon a carcass or their prey they will yell but not come nigh it. You cannot come nigh a rattlesnake but they will rattle with their tail, whereby a man is advertised either to kill them or go by them. They frequently charm the squirrels or other little beasts off the tops of the trees into their mouth, and that without touching them with their teeth, which if they did they would poison themselves. The flea that is troublesome on the low and marshy grounds is not found on the uplands. I am mightily well pleased with my coming over, neither do I think I could live here in Scotland. It is a place that produces many fine fruits and physic herbs. The woods are stored with wild deers, conies, wolves, bears, raccoons, some beavers, and several other beasts which have fine furs, and fish and water-fowl for the killing. The timber are mostly oak of all sorts, walnut and chestnut. Strawberries grow very thick upon the ground amongst the trees, so that some places in the woods are in summer, as it were, covered with a red cloth. The land is exceeding good which is yet to take up, much better than what is inhabited. There is very much 'syder' here which is our principal drink. The Indian natives are not troublesome any way if we do them no harm, but are a kind and loving people. The men do nothing but hunt, and the women they plant corn and work at home. They come and trade among the Christians with skins or venison, and in the summer-time they and their wives come down the rivers in their canoes, which they make themselves of a piece of a great tree like a little boat, and there they fish and take oysters. What I most earnestly desire of you for the encouragement of this plantation is that you would be instrumental to send us over some ministers, who I dare engage shall ever afterwards be thankful."

Little is to be learned of interest in reference to the development of the lands mentioned prior to the beginning of this century. The old building standing on the State Reform School farm remains as a link connecting the eighteenth century with the present. Tradition alone tells us that it was built during the French war of 1754-56, and used for the detention of French prisoners. In the old graveyard attached to it are found some old headstones bearing date previous to that time. On the Monroe side of the Manalapan there can still be seen the remnants of a dam that was in use by the Forge Company, Messrs. Perry, Corne & Hays, before the Revolution. This side of the brook the land was included in what was known as the Faulkner tract, and as late as 1758 was inhabited mostly by Indians; the patent line, reaching from a point marked by a peculiar stone, still well preserved, on the farm of Edmund Rue, at the edge of Manalapan Brook, thence along the farm of Alexander Redmond and others, may still be traced to the Delaware River.

On the farm of Alexander Redmond and adjoining the land of the Widow Lane was the Brainerd settlement, and there was the scene of the distinguished labors of the great missionary. Rev. Mr. Brainerd first preached to the Indians in the woods between Stockbridge and Albany, N. Y., but without much apparent success. He then about 1745 turned his attention to the Indians at the forks of the Delaware and at Crossweeksung, this section, where his labors were crowned with remarkable success. He and his brother John also at one time labored in the Wyoming Valley in Pennsylvania. "His 'Life and Diary Among the Indians,'" wrote an eminent English divine, "exhibits a perfect pattern of the qualities which should distinguish the instructor of rude and barbarous tribes,—the most invincible patience and self-denial, the profoundest humility, exquisite prudence, indefatigable industry, and such a devotedness to God, or rather such an absorption of the whole soul in zeal for the divine glory and salvation of men, as is scarcely paralleled since the age of the apostles." Imagination pictures Brainerd, earnest in purpose, eloquent in speech, gracious in manner, persuasive in conversation, doing his work among the Indians in the primitive forests of Monroe, interested solely for their spiritual and mental development and the consequent improvement in their temporal affairs, and his name seems, like those of Heckewelder and Eliot, a reproach upon the "Indian policy" now pursued by a powerful government towards the remnant of a once numerous and in many respects admirable people.

When Alexander Redmond purchased the property in 1841 many cellars, showing the former location of houses in the Brainerd settlement, were visible, and he long retained stones that had been used as hearths, as well as many relics of the Indians exhumed there. The old apple- and cherry-trees of the settlement were then quite numerous. Some of the apple-trees still remain. The brook from which this grove takes its name was called by them "Wigwam Brook," and has its source in springs located in their settlement. In the life of John Brainerd, published by the Presbyterian Board, the year 1754 is spoken of as one of great despondency for the missionary, as "Bethel, to procure which as their permanent home David Brainerd had paid the debts of the Indians, amounting to some ninety pounds, and aided them to clear its forests with his own labor, was now passing from their hands forever." A short time after the Scotch society which had supported him in his missionary field withdrew that assistance, and Brainerd sought other service. In this connection it is interesting to read an old deed in the possession of Mr. Alexander Redmond, by which it appears that on the 12th of July, 1754 (the year above mentioned), the Rev. John Brainerd conveyed to Peter Deremer the land adjacent to Wigwam Brook, including lands now owned by Mrs. James Redmond, Alexander Redmond, Edmund Rue, and the estate of James Buckelew. The historic character of this locality becomes still more interesting when we remember that Brainerd's helpmate was the Rev. William Tennent, at that time the remarkable and powerful pastor of the old Tennent Church in Monmouth County. After Brainerd went to Newark, in 1755, the Scotch society made an agreement to give him twenty-five pounds per annum for visiting the congregation once a week, catechising their children, and sometimes administering the communion on the Lord's day, hoping thereby to keep the Indian congregation together.¹ Previous to 1738 some Presbyterians, mostly from the Cranbury neighborhood, and certain members of the Church of England owned a house of worship conjointly which stood in School District No. 32, in Monroe, where the "Old Church" school-house now is. The two sects are thought to have separated in the years mentioned, and nothing later is known of the church or its Episcopalian worshipers, who about that time seem to have become sole owners.²

Tice Mount, of English descent, located very early at Matchaponix, now known locally as "Texas," in the northeastern part of the township, and died there at an advanced age. His sons were Joseph and Hugh Taylor Mount, and he had daughters named Catharine and Rebecca. Joseph married a daughter of Henry Dellatosh, and located on the Alexander Redmond farm, near Jamesburg. His children were quite numerous, but only one son, Morgan, lived to manhood. Of his daughters, Elsie married Joseph Cosner, Polly married Benjamin Hayes, and lives at Freehold, and Catharine is unmarried. Hugh Taylor Mount married Catharine, daughter of Cornelius Johnson, and both lived to a ripe old age. Their children were named Cornelius J., Catharine, Tice, Joseph, Rachel, and Ellen. Cornelius J. married Nancy Davison, daughter of William Davison, and both are living, he aged eighty-three, she aged seventy-five. Their sons, John, Alfred, and William H. Mount, are well known. The former married Ellen, daughter of Thomas Day; the latter, Amanda, daughter of Paul Davison.

Peter Mount, who has been dead many years, was another early settler at Matchaponix, as was John Rue, who owned a good deal of land, and was often referred to as "rich Johnny Rue." His sons were named Isaac, Joseph, and John, and none of them are now living there. Tice Rue was another early comer in that neighborhood. His sons were Tice, Joseph, Matthias, and John. Matthias' death was so sudden, and the circumstances surrounding it so strange, that it will long be remembered how he was taken suddenly ill in the court-room at New Brunswick years ago and died almost immediately. John, a son of Matthias, is living at Matchaponix. Edmund, a son of John and a grandson of Tice Rue, resides near Jamesburg. Cornelius Johnson was an early resident in the same section, and was a man of some prominence, taking a leading part in matters of importance. We find his name among those of the subscribers to the fund for the erection of the Presbyterian Church at Cranbury, which was pledged between 1785 and 1788. He had sons named William, Cornelius, Reuben, and Tice. William married Rebecca Tone. Cornelius became a physician, and for many years lived and practiced his profession in Spotswood. He married into the Schureman family of New Brunswick. Reuben married Phebe De Witt, of Cranbury; Tice (first wife), Ann, daughter of James Cottrell; and John, Polly Tone, a sister of William's wife.

Another family of Mounts than the one previously mentioned are quite numerous in Monroe. They are the descendants of (1) Joseph B. Mount, who died about 1840 at the age of eighty-four. His children were named William, Samuel, Brittain, John, Joseph, David, Lewis, Barbara, Mary Ann, Catharine, Susan, Lucinda, Lydia A., and Hannah. (2) William lived and died in the township a few years ago, aged ninety-six. His sons were Joseph, Samuel, Benjamin, Augustus, and William, some of whom are dead, and none of whom live in Monroe. He had daughters named Mary Ann, Barbara, Hannah, and Elizabeth. (3) Samuel went West and died there, leaving no family. (4) Brittain also went West and married there, and at his death left two sons. (5) John married Sarah Bennett, by whom he had children named Joseph B., Aaron, John, Henry, Brittain, Ursula, Hannah, Sarah Ann, and Helen. Joseph B. married Margaret Applegate, and is living in Monroe. His son, John H. Mount, is a farmer. Another, Daniel A., is a wheelwright at Half-Acre. Other sons of his are named Charles B., William, and George, and he has daughters named Eleanor, Sarah, Caroline, and Anna. (6) Joseph is a resident of Monmouth County. (7) David married Elizabeth A., daughter of Furman Applegate, and is a farmer and resident of Monroe, having children named Joseph H., John A., Benjamin L., Hannah L., Ann, Amelia, Irene, and Sarah L. (8) Lewis is a resident of Canada, and there married.

William Day settled in Monmouth County in 1720. He had two sons, John and William. The former located early in Monroe, and reared a family there. The latter remained in Monmouth County, and his sons settled in Monroe, where the descendants of both are numerous.

At Matchaponix Joseph Perrine was an early settler. He was a descendant of one of two brothers, who were the progenitors, as is supposed, of all of the name in America. They were named Henry and Daniel Perrine, and were natives of France. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) they fled from La Rochelle, Lower Charente, France, and in company with others embarked for America, the hope of the Huguenots, in a large sailing-vessel named the "Caledonia," which entered the bay at Amboy in so dilapidated a condition as to be unable to make a landing and stranded, and was abandoned on the southeastern shore of Staten Island. Joseph Perrine, who was a large landowner at Matchaponix, had six sons, one of whom, John, inherited a portion of the tract and settled on it. He had eight children, of whom one is John, known as ex-Judge Perrine, now, at the age of eighty-four, a resident at Bloomfield Mills, in East Brunswick, near Spotswood. He was early and long a surveyor and conveyancer, and at different times and places a merchant for nearly forty years. Elected a justice of the peace in 1825, he served more than thirty years. He was elected a member of the New Jersey Council in 1834; was judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Middlesex County, 1837-64, serving much of the time as presiding judge; was appointed a master in chancery in 1851, and was a member of the New Jersey Legislature, 1866-67. His sons are prominent business men of South Amboy.

(1) Peter Vanderhoof settled at Rhode Hall¹ about 1775, and was a farmer and a prominent man in his day, holding the office of justice of the peace many years. His children were named David, John, Peter, Michael, and Ann. (2) David married Mary Barclay and located across the present township line in South Brunswick, near the homestead, and had a son named Alfred, and two daughters named Margaret Ellen and Mary Ellen. (3) John died a bachelor. (4) Peter married and settled at New Brunswick. (5) Michael married Margaret Van Pelt and remained on the family homestead at Rhode Hall, and his sons, David, John, and Peter, all lived there.

Early in the last century (1) James Gulick settled at Rhode Hall, and became a farmer and blacksmith. He married Elizabeth Snediker, and had a family of five sons and a daughter. The sons were named David, Moses, Aaron, James, and Isaac. The daughter was named Rachel. (2) David married Catharine Scott and removed to New York, where he was a merchant until 1823, when he purchased the place in South Brunswick since known as the Gulick farm, where he lived until his death, about 1835. His family consisted of a son named Alexander and four daughters named Eliza, Mary, Jane, and Nancy. Eliza married Henry Van Aken and resides on the farm. (3) Moses removed to New York and died without issue. (4) Aaron married Agnes Force and resided on the homestead, keeping a public-house, and dying there at the age of ninety-two. His children were Eliza, Mary, David, Sarah, Rachel, and Emeline. Rachel married George T. McDowell, and lived and died at the old homestead. (5) James went to New York and engaged in the mercantile business, and served the city five years as recorder and two years as chief engineer of the fire department. He was also superintendent of the Croton water-works, and died at the age of seventy-five. (6) Isaac married Millicent Calvin, and was in trade in New York.

The McDowell family, mentioned in the history of South Brunswick, had as their progenitor Thomas McDowell, who located at Rhode Hall in 1774, and who, after marrying Mary Thompson, née Williamson, kept the old Williamson tavern. His descendants are numerous, and some of them have attained prominence. E. A. McDowell, a well-known actor, is a great-grandson of his, and a son of his grandson, Thomas McDowell, of Washington.

At a date considerably anterior to the Revolution (1) Anthony Applegate located in the southern part of the township, on the road from Hightstown to Englishtown, and near the "Red Tavern." During the war he was awakened in the night by some one at the door demanding entrance. Leaping from his bed, he hastily threw open the door, when he was shot by a band of desperadoes outside. Who they were and in what manner Applegate had incurred their enmity was never ascertained. He was a quiet and unobtrusive man, and had not taken a decided stand either for or against the colonies, and could hardly have been marked as a victim on political grounds. Two of his children were named Thomas and Abigail. (2) Thomas married Sarah Baird, who died, more than one hundred years of age, in 1881, and lived on the place where his father settled, and reared a family of seven children, named Lydia, Anthony, David B., Thomas, Sarah, Abigail, and John. (3) Lydia married John Wycoff and lived in Mercer County. (4) Anthony espoused Helen Riggs, and after her death Edna Perrine. His children were Cornelia, who married Stephen Box and removed to Indiana; John, Kenneth, Mary Ann, and Ida, all of whom died young; Thomas, who married Helena Voorhees and emigrated to Nebraska; Helena, who became Mrs. Luther Dey, and after his death Mrs. Egbert Brown, removing to Cranbury; Sarah Ann, who married Frederick Applegate and resides in the "Red Tavern" neighborhood; Harriet, who is the wife of Thomas C. Mount, of Cranbury; Abbie, who married Levi Opdyke and lives in East Brunswick; David B., who married Rebecca Hutchinson and lives at Red Tavern; and John P., Disbrow, and Gertrude, who live on the homestead.

James Snediker, of Holland Dutch nativity, located near the South Brunswick line, where he was an extensive farmer, and lived to the age of one hundred years. He reared a large family, some of whom are residents of the township.

(1) Cornelius Van Dorne located near Prospect Plains (now so called) at an early date. His wife was Sophia Snediker. Their children were Cornelius, Jr., Grace, Elizabeth, Henry, Isaac, Sophia, Sarah Ann, and Eliza. (2) Cornelius, Jr., died unmarried. (3) Grace became the wife of Daniel Voorhees, now of Piscataway. (5) Elizabeth married Michael Camp, and both died in the township. (6) Henry married Elizabeth Stults and located at Prospect Plains. Cornelius, James, William, John H., Gideon, Ellen, Sophia, Mary, and Elizabeth were their children. The only one of these now resident in Monroe is Mary, now Mrs. Daniel I. Day, living at an advanced age at Union Valley. (7) Isaac married Ruth Rudd and removed to Toms River, N. J. (8) Sophia died young. (9) Sarah Ann married Martin Nevius and removed to New Brunswick. (10) Eliza espoused John Vanderhoof and lived near Prospect Plains.

Another settler in the vicinity of Prospect Plains was Henry Stults, who located there in the latter part of the last century. He married Ellen Cortelyou. Their children were Albert, Peter, Jacob, William, Ralph C., Henry, Mary, Elizabeth, Ellen, and Kate. Albert married Martha Van Dorne; Peter, Charity Salters; Jacob, Margaret Snediker; William, Eliza Snediker; Ralph C., Hannah Dey; Henry, Rose Snediker; Elizabeth, Henry Van Dorne; Kate, Lewis Dey. All of these lived in the township and reared families. Ellen died unmarried; Mary married Asa Applegate and lived at New Brunswick.

Items of War History.—In 1778, when the British evacuated Philadelphia and the American army pursued, the memorable days, June 26th to 28th, found the inhabitants of this township alert, especially as Washington's army passed almost within hailing distance from the locality of Jamesburg.

"William Lyon, a Continental soldier, died in this township in 1841. He served throughout the war of the Revolution, and was in most of the actions in which the Jersey troops were engaged. About the time of the battle of Trenton, as he was marching with his feet bare and bloody over the frozen ground, he took from a clothes-line near a dwelling a pair of stockings. The lady of the house came out and reproached him for the act. He answered her by simply pointing to his lacerated feet. Further argument was unnecessary. She went back in tears. Washington saw him, and tapping him on the shoulder said, "My brave boy, you deserve a better fate!"

"Ah," replied the heroic soldier, "there is no danger of my feet freezing as long as the blood runs!"¹

The war of 1812-14 had its patriots from Monroe, and pensioners of that war lived there many years.

The soldiers' monument in the cemetery of the First Presbyterian Church at Cranbury bears the names of heroes from Monroe who gave their lives in their country's service during the Rebellion. It is remembered, to the honor and credit alike of Monroe and the committee who had the matter in charge, that in response to the demand of the President for the township's quota of soldiers in 1864 a subscription was raised to defray the expense of placing the requisite number of men in the field, and so generous was the response that only fifty per cent. of the money subscribed was required, and the remainder was returned to the subscribers pro rata. The committee consisted of Ezekiel Silvers, Gilbert S. Davison, and Isaac L. Buckelew.

Organization.—By authority of the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey it was enacted, Feb. 23, 1838, that all that portion of the township of South Amboy lying west of the Matchaponix and South Rivers be established a separate township, to be known as Monroe, and the inhabitants of the territory designated were constituted a body politic and corporate by the name of "the Inhabitants of the Township of Monroe, in the County of Middlesex."

Provisions were made in the act for the assumption of assets and liabilities by the townships of South Amboy and Monroe in the proportion of the taxable property and inhabitants within the limits of their territory respectively, and for the division between the two towns of the paupers chargeable to South Amboy prior to the erection of Madison from its territory. It was provided that the poor-house farm, previously belonging to the township of South Amboy, with the buildings and improvements thereon, should thenceforth belong to the townships of Monroe and South Amboy in the proportion of the tax assessed to the inhabitants residing within the bounds of each on the last duplicate, to be held by them in common. The first town-meeting of Monroe was appointed to be held "at the house of Jacob Vandelee, inn-keeper, on the second Monday of April, 1838." A portion of East Brunswick was taken from Monroe in 1860, and a portion of Cranbury in 1872.

Civil List.—Below will be found a complete list of all the principal township officials chosen in Monroe each year from 1838 to the present time. The records of the township are in excellent condition, complete, and well kept, reflecting much credit on Mr. Robert R. Vandenberg, who has been township clerk continuously since 1850.

Educational.—PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—There are in Monroe eight school districts, known as Jamesburg District, No. 56; Matchaponix District, No. 57; Prospect Plains District, No. 58; Monroe District, No. 59; Gravel Hill District, No. 60; Old Church District, No. 62; Grove District, No. 63; and Pleasant Grove District, No. 64.

The first school-house in the Jamesburg District was located about half a mile from the mill, on the road to Englishtown. It had slab seats and straight benches, and was abandoned in 1847, and a new two-story brick building of more modern construction was erected by James Buckelew, on a lot owned by him near the Presbyterian Church, which for a number of years he permitted the district to use without rent. In 1864 the school-room on the ground floor was furnished with improved desks, and in 1866, to make room for the Presbyterian parsonage, the building was removed to its present site, at the corner of Church Street and Gatzner Avenue. In August, 1875, the heirs of James Buckelew deeded the house and lot to the district, and by the expenditure of fifteen hundred dollars the building was enlarged, remodeled, and re-furnished. The improvements made were of the most substantial character, within and without, and the district now has a valuable property. In 1846 there was a division of this district because the trustees refused to admit a colored boy to the school. One faction built the school-house now in Monroe District, and Jamesburg was supplied by the school-house erected, as above stated, by James Buckelew.

The early schools at Matchaponix are said to have been established far beyond the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The fathers of men now past fourscore were taught in them. They were of the kind usually denominated "pay-schools," and at first do not appear to have been kept in any regular school-house. The first school-houses remembered were log structures of a truly primitive style. The teachers were men who came into the neighborhood prospecting, or without any regular employment, and who, to have something to do and turn an honest penny, opened schools by subscription. Some of them were smart, passably educated young Irishmen, who were trying their fortunes in the new country, and had not yet settled upon what their occupation was to be and where they should locate. The oft-told stories of "lockings out," "barring in," etc., which seem to have had foundation in nearly every pioneer section, had their counterparts in events which occurred at Matchaponix. It is said that at one time the scholars locked the teacher out, and in retaliation he clambered to the roof and placed a slab over the chimney, with the design of smoking out the scholars. This they soon dislodged, seeing which the teacher again went up and put the slab on the chimney and sat on it, with the expectation that the scholars would soon have to open the door to get air. But they were no less determined than he, and taking a rail or large strong pole of some sort which was fortunately at hand, several of the big boys literally "bounced" the slab and the surprised pedagogue off the roof and into an adjacent snow-bank. At another time, it is related, a teacher, having been "barred out," barred the scholars in and kept them there several days, during which their parents, who enjoyed the joke, carried them provisions, which they received through an opening so small as to forbid ingress or egress, the resolute and unyielding "master of the birch" meanwhile standing guard outside.

There was an early school in the Rhode Hall neighborhood; nothing of particular interest can be learned of the other schools. The following statistics show the status of the schools of Monroe in 1880: Number of school-houses in the township, 8, in fair condition. Total valuation of school property, $7300, divided among the several districts as follows: District No. 56, $3000; No. 57, $600; No. 58, $1500; No. 60, $300; No. 64, $400; Nos. 59, 62, and 63, $500 each. Number of children of the school age in District No. 56, 134; No. 57, 50; No. 58, 87; No. 59, 61; No. 60, 56; No. 62, 75; No. 63, 40; No. 64, 41; total in the township, 553. Estimated number attending private schools, 32; attending no schools, 161. Number of teachers employed: males, 4; females, 5. Average monthly salary of males, $32; of females, $30.50; average number of months schools were kept open, 10; total amount received from all sources for public school purposes, $3246.76; amount of apportionment from State appropriation, $2864.26; amount raised by taxation for the support of district schools, $382.50. Districts Nos. 56 and 57 have libraries containing respectively 22 and 36 volumes. In Districts Nos. 60 and 63 movements are on foot looking to the establishment of libraries.

THE JAMESBURG INSTITUTE.—A desire on the part of many citizens for a more advanced system of education than that afforded in the public schools led the Messrs. Buckelew, in 1873, to erect a building for the use of an academic school to be known by the above name. The institute was opened in the fall of that year by Mr. M. Oakey with a class of young men. His labors were appreciated and encouraged to such an extent as to render the enterprise a success.

THE NEW JERSEY STATE REFORM SCHOOL.—In 1865 the Legislature of New Jersey enacted a law providing for the establishment of a reform farm school for juvenile delinquents, to which boys between the ages of eight and sixteen years were to be sent with a view to their instruction and amendment of life. A farm of four hundred and ninety acres was purchased in 1866 near Jamesburg. Buildings were erected and the school opened by the reception of the first pupil July 6, 1867. There are now about two hundred and seventy-five scholars, who are instructed in the elementary branches of learning and accustomed to agriculture and other branches of labor, with an allowance of time for youthful recreation. When regarded as having been fitted for removal (in not less than a year after admission to the school), good homes are sought for them either with their friends or by indenture to proper persons, the board of trustees continuing their guardianship over them during their minority.

The board of control of this institution consists of Governor George C. Ludlow, Chancellor Theodore Runyon, and Chief Justice Mercer Beasley. The trustees are Messrs. Samuel Allinson, of Yardville, Mercer Co.; Nathan T. Stratton, of Mullica Hill, Gloucester Co.; Nathaniel S. Rose, of Cream Ridge, Monmouth Co.; David Ripley, of Newark, Essex Co.; M. S. Higbee, of South Amboy; and George W. Helme, of Jersey City.

The establishment is in charge of James H. Eastman, superintendent, Samuel L. McFadden, assistant superintendent, and Elizabeth F. Eastman, matron.

The receipts from the Reform School farm and from the mechanical industries in 1881 were $50,722.67, of which $33,000 was from the State, $15,492.16 from the labor of boys in the shirt manufactory, $1978.82 from produce, material, and stock sold, and $251.09 from miscellaneous sources.

The disbursements were $56,392.24, of which $40,835.07 were for salaries, provisions, labor, fuel, clothing, and other expenses for the use of the institution, $11,459.67 for machinery, farm implements, boilers and boiler-house, pumps and fire apparatus, furniture, repairs and improvements to buildings, and labor and machinery at brick-yard, and $4097.50 for new barns.

Villages and Hamlets.¹—JAMESBURG is located on Manalapan Creek, in the northeast part of the township. "Upper" and "Lower" Jamesburg are local names distinguishing the two extremities of the village. The grist-mill, saw-mill, and fulling-mill at the present site of Jamesburg had been established previous to the year 1792, and, together with one or two buildings for residences and a small store, constituted what was then known as Ensley's Mills. Billy West's tavern stood on the corner of the Half-acre road, just inside Mr. J. D. Buckelew's present inclosure, and the last of it was taken down nine or ten years ago, it having for a year previously been used as a canning-factory. Nov. 15, 1800, John Mount bought the mill property of George Russell, and it was for eighteen years afterward known as Mount's Mills. Mount prospered, and added to his lands from time to time until he owned most of the land on the west side of Manalapan Brook lying between the present lands of Alexander Redmond and the estate of Abraham S. Davison. In 1818 the mill property was turned over to William Gordon, who married the only child of John Mount, after which the place was called Gordon's Mills until Nov. 10, 1832, when Mr. James Buckelew purchased Mount's entire interest, from which date it was known as Buckelew's Mills.

At that time the property consisted of the saw-mill, still preserved; the grist-mill, since enlarged and improved; the fuling-mill, standing at the easterly end of the grist-mill, long since destroyed; the dwelling-house, now the enlarged and remodeled residence of Mrs. James Buckelew; also the dwelling since occupied by Mrs. Marsh, then standing near the centre of the present road, one end being used as a store, and the dwelling since occupied by James D. Browne. On the west side of the brook opposite the saw-mill stood a small house, now on the south side of Willow Street. The old Gwinnip house stood on the lot at the corner of Church Street and Gatzmer Avenue.

Simon Van Meker's old residence, later the house of Nelson B. Smock, stood near its present site, while the old Peter Deremer house, since metamorphosed into the residence of James Redmond, was suggestive of a generation familiar with Brainerd and his Indian friends. Opposite was the farm-house of William W. Davison, built in 1807, since removed by his son, the late Abraham S. Davison, to the site of the present family homestead. At West's tavern were three log houses, and at the other end of the settlement, within the present limits of Col. I. S. Buckelew's lawn, was the dwelling of Daniel Davison, afterwards moved and changed into the house since occupied by Mrs. Mahala Mount.

James Farrington kept the store for some time, and was succeeded by James Buckelew, followed by John A. Davison, and in 1848 by James Redmond. The building of the Camden and Amboy Railroad (1830-33) formed an epoch in the history of this vicinity. James Buckelew's interests were at an early period largely identified with that road, he no doubt anticipating therefrom great advantages for his embryo village.

The first trains were drawn by horses, and though it seems strange that an accident of a serious nature could occur to a train with such a motive-power, a fatal accident did occur within the village limits, a passenger being killed by the upsetting of a car near the station, then called "West's Turnout." He was a stranger, and the last sad offices for the dead were reverently performed by the villagers at West's tavern. The railroad, as originally laid out, followed the present line of the Freehold and Jamesburg Railroad, diverging therefrom near the present engine-house, crossing Gatzmer Avenue on a curve, passing a little north of the L. Cox residence, and thence at an angle across a lot formerly occupied by Buckelew's canning-factory, and entering the present road near the John Bennett place. The granite stones upon which the bed of the road was originally laid are still occasionally unearthed along the line. The first station in the village stood near the willow-trees opposite the Charles West residence, and was a one-story building. In 1850 the railroad was straightened and the station built on its present site. When, Jan. 1, 1872, the Camden and Amboy Railroad was leased by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, with the branches from Bordentown to Trenton and from Jamesburg to Monmouth Junction, it was constituted the Amboy Division, and Isaac S. Buckelew appointed superintendent.

The name Jamesburg was first applied to the district school in honor of James Buckelew, who erected and granted to the district the use of a school-house, as has been stated, and at once, in honor of the man by whose untiring perseverance, energy, shrewdness, and sound judgment the place owed its prospects for future advancement, was given by common consent to the village, which was duly christened by the insertion of a tablet in the gable of the school-house bearing the inscription, "Jamesburg, 1847."

It was several years before the railroad company thought it advantageous to stop for passengers at the village, and after they concluded to do so the name was not at first popular on the railroad. Perhaps the company wanted to use up the old tickets marked "West's;" at any rate the conductor would call "West's," and then in an undertone, "Jamesburg."

July 21, 1845, James Buckelew and Nathaniel S. Rue established a stage line between Freehold and Jamesburg, connecting with the railroad for New York, carrying in the second year of their enterprise five thousand and seventy-four through passengers, the fare being eighty-seven and a half cents. Afterwards they established a through line from Philadelphia to Long Branch, often sending out from here as many as thirty coaches and wagons to accommodate their patrons. This gave way to the Freehold and Jamesburg Agricultural Railroad, which, surveyed in 1851 by Col. I. S. Buckelew, under direction of Gen. William Cook, chief engineer of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, was completed so that trains commenced running regularly from Freehold July 18, 1853.

The first regular morning train left Freehold at 6.30, running through to South Amboy, and connecting there with the New Brunswick boat for New York, Charles Worts, of Jamesburg, being the engineer.

About this time there arose a demand for increased mail facilities, Spottswood being the nearest post-office, and sharing with Cranbury the distribution of mail matter for the intermediate country. It is said that often two weeks were required to transmit a letter from Brooklyn, N. Y., to Jamesburg. In 1848, soon after succeeding John A. Davison in the mercantile business, James Redmond was commissioned postmaster, retaining his commission until 1853, though from 1850 onward his brother William was the acting postmaster. In 1833, James C. Stout had built a small store building near the present crossing of Gatzmer Avenue with the Freehold and Jamesburg Railroad, which had been unoccupied for some time, when, in 1851, Mr. J. C. Magee renovated it and opened a store in it. In 1853, Mr. Magee relinquished this store and opened one in the building erected by Mr. Buckelew for that purpose not far from the mill, but on the opposite side of the street, and succeeded Mr. Redmond, becoming the second village postmaster, which position he retained for nearly fifteen years. He was succeeded by George Van Artsdalen, who, in the spring of 1878, turned over his trust to the present postmaster, Harrison W. Crosby. It was not until after Mr. Magee had been postmaster some two years that he succeeded in having a direct mail from Philadelphia and New York. Previous to that time all local mail matter from the cities was sent via Freehold, and was two or three days in transit.

In 1866, Mr. Magee removed his store to the upper part of the village, and is now senior partner in the firm of Magee & Davison, lumber shippers and merchants in coal and hardware. Other merchants in the village are Paxton & Buckelew, George Van Artsdalen, Harrison W. Crosby, Thomas Charlton, and I. S. Bennett. Benjamin Arber has a boot and shoe store, and F. H. Pownall an undertaking establishment. There are two tin-shops and stores, kept by Adam Schellbacher and Albert Keinze respectively.

The Jamesburg House was erected in 1856 by James Buckelew. Richard Fleming was the first occupant and landlord. It has several times changed hands, and in 1881 was purchased by the present proprietor, David C. Bowne.

In 1855 the village contained thirty houses and two hundred inhabitants. Its present population, inclusive of operatives in the shirt-factory of Downs & Finch, is estimated at nearly one thousand. Since about 1866 the growth has been rapid, and new dwellings are constantly appearing in all directions. The immense business of Messrs. Downs & Finch has given an added impetus to the material advancement of the place. Another powerful aid has been the Mutual Building and Loan Association. This was organized Feb. 18, 1869, and 349 shares were issued. A second series was started in October, 1872, with 543 shares; a third series in November, 1876, with 251 shares; a fourth series in November, 1879, with 443 shares; and a fifth series in November, 1881, with 267 shares. The first officers of the association were J. C. Magee, president; C. S. Worts, vice-president; A. P. Knapen, secretary; Benjamin Snyder, treasurer; W. H. Courter, solicitor. The directors were F. L. Buckelew, J. D. Buckelew, W. H. Courter, J. D. Heath, Isaac Brown, Samuel Marryott, and H. A. Perrine. The present officers are J. C. Magee, president; Samuel Marryott, vice-president; John D. Courter, secretary; T. Wilton Hill, treasurer; W. H. Courter, solicitor. The directors are George A. Shultz, William H. Williams, James D. Bowne, Charles E. Paxton, and Isaac S. Davison.

There are in the village the usual variety of small mechanics' shops.

UNION VALLEY is a hamlet in the southwest part of the township, containing a store, one church, and about fifteen dwellings. The first store there was opened by Samuel Mace in 1855. He was soon succeeded by Edgar W. Reed; he in 1860 by Charles Perrine; he in 1862 by George Wader; and he in 1864 by William Doty, who continued in business there until 1865. The old store building is still standing, at the intersection of the Cranbury and English-town roads.

HALF-ACRE.—This is an abbreviation of a flippant name of a sulphurous suggestiveness by which is known a settlement in the west part of Monroe, about two miles and a half southerly from Jamesburg, containing a store, a hotel, a wheelwright- and blacksmith-shop, and a few dwellings. Years ago the locality was called "the Devil's half-acre," on account, it is said, of having gotten into bad odor with the public as a consequence of frequent unseemly orgies and hand-to-hand encounters at the old tavern there, in the days when a resort to arms is stated to have been a favorite mode of adjusting personal misunderstandings, and "hard hitters" are supposed to have been plenty everywhere. There is another version of the manner in which the place came to be called Half-Acre, which totally ignores the suppositious connection of the Evil One with the locality. It is to the effect that there were two wagon roads passing the ancient hostelry, one in front and the other just at its rear, and that the latter road was fenced up by the then proprietor in such a manner as to form an inclosure behind the tavern of half an acre of land, which circumstance caused the name "Half-Acre House" to attach to the hotel, and in time to the immediate neighborhood.

The tavern at Half-Acre is now known as the Monroe House, and was built in the latter part of the eighteenth century. The earliest-remembered occupant was Daniel Lott, who, it is claimed, fenced up the back road as above mentioned. Joseph Schenck was his successor, till the property was purchased by Samuel Wetherell, who leased it to various occupants. After his death, about 1832, it was purchased by Thomas Hoffman, who also rented it to transient keepers. About 1860 it was bought by Nelson Thompson, who in about a year was succeeded by E. A. Thompson, since whose death, in July, 1881, it has been managed by his widow, Mrs. Mary A. Thompson, and his son, John N. Thompson.

The blacksmith-shop has been in charge of Nelson Barkeley. D. A. Mount, wheelwright, began business there in 1878. The store of Mrs. H. A. Mount, wife of the latter, was opened in 1877. The store and the two shops mentioned are the property of George Morse.

RED TAVERN.—A hamlet in the southern part of the township derived the above name from an old tavern there, which was kept during the Revolution, and perhaps earlier. Col. Jones, who was the proprietor in 1800, had probably then been some time there. Jones had many and frequent successors till 1853, when the property was purchased by S. D. Vandenberg. It stands on the road leading from Hightstown to Englishtown, and its long-familiar red exterior has for some time been obscured by paint of a different hue.

Cook & Jones established a store there about 1857 in a building which has been since their time occupied by several merchants for longer or shorter periods. The present proprietor is Anthony Applegate.

Besides the tavern and the store there are two wheelwright-shops, owned by William and Ellison Everingham respectively, and a dozen houses, more or less.

PROSPECT PLAINS is the name of a railroad station, post-office, and hamlet located on the old Camden and Amboy Railroad, near the western border of the township, south from the centre, containing a store, a hotel, a school-house, a blacksmith-shop, a hay-pressing and shipping establishment, and a shirt laundry.

The store at Prospect Plains was opened by Davison & Stonaker in 1832, and kept by them till 1833. It has been since kept by Garret S. Davison until his death in 1845; by his widow and son, J. S. Davison, until 1850; by J. S. and D. G. Davison until 1860; and by D. G. Davison to this date. The post-office was established in 1851, with D. G. Davison as postmaster. He has held the office continuously to the present.

The Railroad House was built in 1832 for a dwelling-house by William Stults. In 1862 it was converted into a hotel. The present proprietor, George D. Bergen, purchased it in 1878, previous to which time it had had several occupants.

A blacksmith-shop was long the property of the Davison family, its first owners having been J. S. and D. G. Davison. It was rented to several successive wielders of the hammer, the first of whom was Gilbert Perrine. The shop at present in use is the property of the A. J. Hoffman estate. The "smithy" is Nathaniel Cox.

The shirt laundry is managed by D. G. Davison, employing twenty-four hands.

The hay-press was set up in 1876 by Gedney & Hoffman. It is now operated by A. W. Dey.

HOFFMAN AND TRACY STATIONS are flag-stations located on the Freehold Railroad, in the easterly and extreme eastern portions of the township respectively.

RHODE HALL is a hamlet containing a hotel (one of the oldest in the section), a store, and several dwellings, lying mostly in South Brunswick, but partially in the northwestern portion of Monroe.

Industrial Enterprises.—THE DOWNS & FINCH SHIRT-FACTORY.—The fancy shirt manufactory of Downs & Finch was founded in 1871, by Finley, Gourlay & Finch, in which firm Mr. Downs, of the present firm of Downs & Finch, was a special partner. In 1874, Finley, Gourlay & Finch were succeeded by Downs, Gourlay & Finch, and the latter firm by Downs & Finch in 1876. The factory at first consisted of a single building about seventy feet by thirty, with a capacity to turn out fifty to one hundred dozen shirts per week, and gave employment to about one hundred hands. Since that time the business has grown to be the most extensive of its kind in the world, having overleaped the limits of the village of Jamesburg in its rapid development and necessitated the establishment of a branch at Bordentown as large as the parent factory, a second branch at Hightstown, and a third at Trenton. The aggregate capacity of the three factories, which have their headquarters at Jamesburg, is between 4000 and 5000 dozen shirts and 15,000 to 20,000 dozen collars and cuffs per week. The firm has 3500 hands on its pay-rolls, and $15,000 to $20,000 is disbursed each semi-monthly pay-day. About 7,500,000 yards of cloth and spool-cotton, to the value of $30,000, are consumed annually in the manufacture of shirts, and the firm buys starch for use in their laundries in lots of four or five car-loads of fifteen tons each.

Additions to the works at Jamesburg have been made by the erection of new buildings from year to year as the growing business has required. The main building, known as "No. 1," is an imposing brick structure with two wings, making a frontage of 170 feet by 50 feet depth, three stories high, with a slightly five-story entrance-tower in front, containing staircases leading to the several floors and extending two stories above the main building. At the rear of the eastern wing is a two-story brick extension about seventy feet by thirty-five, which is occupied as a laundry. At the rear of the main building is a boiler and engine-room. The third floor of the main building is occupied as a cutting-room, the second floor as a sewing-room, and the first floor, in connection with the extension above referred to, as an ironing and stock-room. About three hundred feet to the rear of the main building is factory building "No. 10," occupied as a laundry for one class of shirts. Across the water-way which supplies power to the factories is located a building about forty feet by thirty, which contains the general offices of the firm, in which is a telegraph-office and a telephone connecting with the three other factories, enabling the firm to control its complicated business with a facility that before the invention of the telephone would have been impossible. At Upper Jamesburg are located the firm's box-factories, which occupy three large buildings, employ about thirty-five hands, and produce on an average 10,000 boxes per week.

MAGEE & BUCKELEW'S FOUNDRY.—The foundry of Magee & Buckelew at Upper Jamesburg was built in 1878, and enlarged to its present capacity in 1879. It was operated by C. J. Crosby & Brother until 1880, and since then has been under the personal management of Magee & Buckelew, who do a large business, shipping the products of the works throughout the Middle States, and to some extent beyond.

DISTILLERIES.—From 1822 to 1834, Garret S. Davison had a distillery at Prospect Plains. Charles P. Mount put a distillery in operation at Red Tavern about twenty years ago, and continued the business about ten years. The establishment passed into the possession of Joseph Chamberlain about 1872, and in 1876 into that of the present proprietor, S. D. Vandenberg, who had previously leased it a year, and who has since continued the business. The works consist of a still-house twenty-two feet by eighteen, and a three-story and a basement building thirty-five feet by thirty, in which are carried on various other processes necessary to the production of such liquors as are made there.

George McDowell established a distillery near Union Valley, which he operated a number of years until it was purchased by D. M. Perrine, who removed it to a point near Half-Acre, and continued the business until 1880. In the southwestern part of the township A. Petty established a distillery, now continued by his estate. At different times others in the township have been more or less extensively engaged in the manufacture of peach and apple brandy and apple whisky, for which this section has considerable reputation.

MISCELLANEOUS INDUSTRIES.—Appley's drug-and-spice-mill, on Matchaponix Brook, on the northern boundary of the township, was for some time, until a comparatively recent date, an enterprise of importance.

The farmers in the vicinity of Prospect Plains in 1826 and later made brick, which was carted to Princeton. A brick-yard, now idle, on the Buckelew estate, northwest of Jamesburg, was established by James Buckelew about twenty years ago, and brick was manufactured there quite extensively for a number of years.

The steam saw-mill of Edward Snediker at Jamesburg was built in 1881, and furnishes employment to three men. Much lumber is sawed there for Magee & Davison, who are shippers of large quantities.

The First National Bank of Jamesburg.—In our modern system success in finances is closely allied with sound banking institutions. The founder of Jamesburg, early in the history of national banks, took the steps essential towards supplying that need, and in January, 1864, in connection with his sons, Isaac S., John D., and F. Lemuel Buckelew, Mr. Joseph C. McGee, John G. Schultz, and Nathaniel W. Morris (who were the first board of directors), and some twenty of their neighbors, formed the two hundred and eighty-eighth national bank, styled the First National Bank of Jamesburg.

The officers and directors of this institution are as follows: President, Isaac S. Buckelew; Cashier, T. Wilton Hill; Directors, Isaac S. Buckelew, Joseph C. McGee, T. Wilton Hill, George H. Townsend, and F. Lemuel Buckelew.

Former directors not now in service have been James Buckelew, Nathaniel W. Morris, John D. Buckelew, John G. Stults, and James Applegate. William H. Courter and Benjamin Snyder were former cashiers.

The following statement shows the condition of this bank at the close of business Jan. 4, 1882:

Burial-Places.—The burying-ground on the State Reform School farm, near the ancient traditional prison-house, is undoubtedly the oldest graveyard in Monroe. Here and there about the township are spots where one or two graves have been made which are still visible, and doubtless others have disappeared entirely. Near Hoffman Station are some graves of members of the Hoffman family and others. At Union Valley is a burying-ground containing about fifty graves, the first of which was opened early in July, 1852. This ground was given to the Methodist Protestant Church by Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Stults.

FERNWOOD CEMETERY.—Fernwood Cemetery, adjacent to Wigwam Grove, beautifully situated, with a commanding view of a fine landscape, hallowed by its associations with the work of the devoted and faithful Brainerds, is most appropriately set apart for its sacred purpose.

The original association was formed in 1853, and the first land selected for cemetery purposes was on the north side of the Camden and Amboy Railroad, about three-fourths of a mile west of the present depot. Objection being made to its location, by consent of its lot-holders it was changed to its present site in 1859 and its removal was sanctioned by the New Jersey Legislature, which in 1861 passed the act which created the present "Fernwood Cemetery Association."

Under its present charter Messrs. T. S. Snedeker, J. C. Magee, W. H. Courter, J. B. Thompson, and C. W. Johnson were its first board of trustees, and Mr. J. D. Buckelew treasurer.

The plot of ground, containing a little over three acres, was generously donated to the association by Mr. James Buckelew. Among the first family plots selected and improved was one by Mr. Buckelew. On the shaft erected to his memory is the simple inscription, "Born August 13, 1801. Died May 30, 1869."

The association is officered as follows: President, John D. Buckelew; Treasurer and Secretary, F. L. Buckelew; Trustees, John D. Buckelew, William H. Courter, C. W. Johnson, W. H. Mount, and T. Wilton Hill.

Associations and Societies.—THE JAMESBURG SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION ASSOCIATION.—The Jamesburg Sunday-School Convention was founded in 1866 by Mr. J. D. Buckelew, superintendent of the Jamesburg Sunday-school, in connection with Mr. Franklin Dey, of Mercer County, and other superintendents and friends of the Sunday-school cause, for the purpose of giving the scholars an annual picnic, and at the same time furnishing them and their friends with exercises and addresses calculated to both instruct and enhance the interest in Sunday-schools, and has grown to such magnitude as to require the management of a thoroughly systematized organization, which is supplied in the board of officers and teachers of the Jamesburg Sunday-school, who are now recognized as ex officio the Jamesburg Sunday-School Convention Association. The general committee in 1881 was organized as follows: T. Wilton Hill, chairman; John D. Courter, secretary; Rev. B. S. Everitt, John D. Buckelew, Alfred Davison, Joseph C. Magee, J. B. Tallman, F. L. Buckelew, William H. Courter, William H. Mount, L. E. Riddle, A. I. Richardson, Alfred W. Dye.

The annual convention is held in Wigwam Grove on the fourth Wednesday in August, and strenuous efforts are made to secure addresses from able and popular Sunday-school workers (representing various Christian denominations), illustrations of the most improved methods in teaching, together with attractive and inspiring music. It has been estimated that from 10,000 to 12,000 persons have often attended the annual conventions.

THE JAMESBURG AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The Jamesburg Agricultural Society was formally organized on the 27th of April, 1853, with Mr. James Buckelew as president, and Joseph C. Magee and William H. Courter as secretaries. The society was nominally in existence the previous year, and consisted of James Buckelew, Alexander Redmond, Aaron Gulick, Samuel R. Forman, Charles Middleton, Thomas S. Snedeker, Ralph C. Stults, Frederick Farr, and Stephen Van Wickle.

These gentlemen organized and held an agricultural fair Oct. 6, 1852, for the sale, purchase, and exhibition of stock, farming implements, and produce, offering no premiums, but giving every opportunity for a free and complete exhibit of everything useful to the farmer. The fair was a success, and resulted in the formation of the society, having for its object the benefit and improvement of the farming community.

Fairs were held at Jamesburg for five years, attracting many visitors and disseminating much good. The society was the first of its kind organized in the county,—in fact, for a number of years the only society. Of late years it has confined its labors to the distribution of seeds and miscellaneous documents through its corresponding secretary, William H. Courter.

FIDELITY LODGE, I. O. O. F., of Jamesburg, was organized July 6, 1870, with the following charter members and principal officers: William H. Coulter, N. G.; Charles P. Clymer, V. G.; Charles E. Liming, Sec.; Isaac S. Buckelew, Treas.; and John H. Heath, William J. Courter, and Charles E. Woolley.

The present officers are F. Nodocker, N. G.; Henry Jobs, V. G.; John D. Courter, Sec.; C. M. Davison, Treas.

This lodge has a membership of ninety-one, and is represented in the Grand Lodge of New Jersey by one of its members, George S. Courter, Grand Master. The lodge-room is in the second story of the building containing the offices of the First National Bank of Jamesburg, and regular meetings are held every Wednesday evening.

MATILDA LODGE, No. 28, was instituted April 6, 1871, and the following officers were installed: John H. Heath, N. G.; Sarah E. Smock, V. G.; William H. Courter, Sec.; Jennie Smock, Treas.; C. B. Clymer, O. G.; C. G. Cox, I. G.; George Smock, W.; N. B. Smock, C. The present officers are Thomas P. Ryan, N. G.; Mrs. Joseph P. Eler, V. G.; John D. Courter, Sec.; Miss A. Golden, Treas.

ENCAMPMENT No. 51, I. O. O. F., of Jamesburg. Instituted Jan. 3, 1879, this encampment comprised the following charter members: Charles S. Brown, J. D. Browne, George S. Courter, Frank H. Dey, John H. Heath, John N. Heath, F. McNamee, F. Nodocker, P. V. Petty, W. H. Petty, George Van Artsdalen, and William G. Mount. The members number thirty-four. Regular meetings are held Friday evening of each week. The present officers of this encampment are as follows: James D. Browne, C. P.; John H. Elliott, H. P.; J. Albert Keinzle, S. W.; C. M. Davison, Sec.; William H. Courter, Treas.

EVERITT LODGE, I. O. G. T.—About 1870 a lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars, named as above, was organized at Jamesburg.

Churches.—EARLY RELIGIOUS HISTORY.¹—After the days of Brainerd the first religious services in the township were probably held at the beginning of or very early in this century in the old school-house at Jamesburg, and there was early preaching, too, in the Matchaponix neighborhood. Though this section was from the first settled by those whose predilections were Presbyterian, yet the earliest services were generally held by ministers of the Methodist Church, and Rev. Mr. Fountain, living near what is now "Texas," preached occasionally at Jamesburg, and during one year every two weeks. The people expressed great satisfaction with his services, gathering from distances of three or four miles, and giving him flour, meal, and other products as his pay. However, the next year, when an effort was made to raise money for him and the people were called on to contribute the same, there is said to have been a great diminution in attendance, for produce was the more easily obtainable than cash. At John Hoffman's, toward Englishtown, the Methodists held regular Sunday evening services, and the scattered inhabitants were glad to walk even from as far as Jamesburg to attend.

Although thus early in possession of the field, the Methodists failed to occupy it fully, and Rev. Mr. Rice, of Spottswood, and after him Rev. William R. S. Betts, of the same church, Rev. Mr. Woodhull, of Tennent Church, in Monmouth County, and his son, Rev. Spafford Woodhull, and perhaps other Presbyterian clergymen, preached occasionally at Jamesburg, and later Rev. Luther Van Doren, of Tennent Church, and Rev. Symmes Henry, of Cranbury. Rev. Mr. Blythe also came, and Mr. Vincent W. Mount, who led the singing. The people were not satisfied, however, with such occasional services as were thus brought to them, but attended meetings in neighboring settlements. Some, especially the Van Wickle family, and that of William W. Davison, went to Cranbury First Church, and a little later Alexander Redmond's and S. R. Freeman's families in the same direction, though more went to Spottswood. This was after the railroad was constructed. A flat car, provided with temporary seats for the purpose, was drawn by a mule, and often thirty or forty persons would thus go to Spottswood to church. When the Second Presbyterian Church of Cranbury was organized a number of families, among them James Buckelew's and C. G. Snediker's, became identified with it, and continued for several years to attend services there.

When the second school-house at Jamesburg was built by Mr. James Buckelew, in 1847, to meet the want of religious worshippers, a room was partitioned off in it, and provided with pulpit and seats, and connected with folding-doors with the school-room. Here Revs. Henry and Blythe, of Cranbury, held occasional services, with now and then others, till in the spring of 1850, Rev. George C. Bush, who was preaching at South Amboy and South River, came regularly to preach at Jamesburg every other Sabbath evening, and found (as he has said) good congregations and attentive hearers. After about nine months' service he yielded the work to Rev. John A. Annin, then just leaving the seminary at Princeton. During Mr. Bush's labors about twelve were converted, and with these he expected about twelve from other churches were ready to enter a church organization which had been talked of for a time and then took more promising form. Mr. Bush wrote: "I shall never forget the kindness with which the people of Jamesburg treated me. They sent a team to Washington for me, and gave me a good home among them, and worked and prayed with me, giving opportunity for conversation and prayer with their families. They were quick to discern the time to build and organize."

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF JAMESBURG.²—Although the prospects when Rev. John A. Annin took charge of the work at Jamesburg were hopeful, his services continued but three months, to July, 1851, after which there seems to have been no regular supply, and services were held with much irregularity. The matter was not allowed to rest, and the next tangible thing was in the beginning of the year 1853, when a subscription was circulated for securing funds for a church building, which succeeded so well that March 3, 1853, a meeting of the subscribers was held, and William Johnson, Alexander Redmond, Aaron Gulick, Edmund Rue, Joseph C. Magee, I. S. Buckelew, and S. R. Foreman were elected trustees, thus completing a legal organization.

At the same time a petition was signed by seventeen members of other churches and twenty-nine persons not members asking the Presbytery of New Brunswick to organize a church at Jamesburg, in response to which a committee consisting of Revs. S. C. Henry, J. W. Blythe, L. H. Van Doren, and S. D. Alexander met June 6, 1854, and organized the church with eleven members: John C. Vandever and Hannah, his wife; Samuel Maryott and Ann Maria, his wife; James Mount and Mahala, his wife; Margaret C. Buckelew, C. J. Applegate, Sarah Davison, J. B. Johnson, and David C. Bastido. John C. Vandever and John B. Johnson were elected elders.

A building committee, consisting of J. D. Buckelew, J. C. Magee, and S. M. Van Wickle, had, under instructions from the congregation and trustees, proceeded to erect a church building on Church Street, to which it gave its name, the corner-stone being laid Sept. 7, 1853, Rev. George C. Bush, of Stewartsville, and Rev. S. D. Alexander, of Freehold, conducting the exercises. The building was dedicated June 26, 1854, Rev. S. D. Alexander preaching the sermon.

Now regular Sunday services were inaugurated, and the church began at once to raise money for paying supplies, the subscription list showing thirty-nine contributors and the amount $194 for the first quarter, ending Dec. 31, 1854. The supplies were largely students of the theological seminary at Princeton, although the names of Drs. J. C. Moffat, L. Atwater, J. McDonald, Charles Hodge, and Rev. J. W. Blythe, among those of supplies, show that some of the leading ministers of the day preached there. These supplies were paid, and June 30, 1855, the report of the treasurer showed that $503.32 had been raised for the year, being an excess of $148.59 over what had been paid for supplies, which, with a fund subsequently raised by the trustees, was appropriated to paying a debt of $400 still due on the house of worship.

The church, now convinced of its ability to support a pastor, called Rev. J. Halstead Carroll, Feb. 2, 1855, at a salary of $550, and he was ordained and installed May 30th, when Rev. Charles Hodge, D.D., presided, Rev. John Hall, D.D., preached, Rev. W. H. Green, D.D., charged the pastor, and Rev. J. M. McDonald, D.D., charged the people. The new church then began its full work with sixteen members and the following official organization: Rev. J. H. Carroll, pastor; J. C. Vandever, Aaron Gulick, and J. Bergen Thompson, elders; J. B. Thomson, president of trustees; Joseph C. Magee, secretary; J. D. Buckelew, treasurer; Thomas S. Mershon, James Mount, I. S. Buckelew, Alexander Redmond, and S. R. Foreman, trustees; William H. Courter had charge of collecting salary and renting pews; Charles A. Craig was chorister; Samuel Marryott, sexton; and J. D. Buckelew, Sunday-school superintendent.

Mr. Carroll was pastor until Feb. 2, 1858. Rev. William M. Wells, of the theological seminary, Princeton, was called August 10th following, at a salary of five hundred and fifty dollars, and ordained and installed November 4th, Rev. P. O. Studdiford, D.D., preaching, Rev. T. D. Hoover charging the pastor, and Rev. R. Taylor the people. Rev. Mr. Wells ended his pastorate July 1, 1869. Rev. B. S. Everitt, of Montclair, N. J., was called Nov. 2, 1869, and installed Jan. 4, 1870, Rev. J. L. Kehoe, Rev. A. P. Cobb, and Rev. F. Chandler taking part in the exercises.

During Rev. Mr. Carroll's pastorate the church prospered, and at its close had a membership of one hundred and twenty-nine. Notwithstanding that during the first two years of his connection with the church twenty members were dismissed and four died, the labors of Rev. Mr. Wells were so successful that in the third year of his pastorate the church numbered one hundred and thirty-five, and at the time of his departure one hundred and sixty members, though during his stay sixty-five had united with other churches and twenty-six had died. In 1864 the present parsonage was purchased, and in 1867 the church was enlarged at an expense of about twenty-five hundred dollars, and Feb. 8, 1868, rededicated by Rev. R. M. Patterson, of Philadelphia. As a result of the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Everitt the membership of the church has been increased to three hundred and ninety-eight. The parsonage has been enlarged and repaired, the seating capacity of the main audience-room of the church has been increased, and the lecture- and Sunday-school rooms built in 1871 and dedicated November 30th, at an expense of about five thousand dollars, and a considerable sum in the aggregate has been otherwise expended in improving and beautifying the church property, which is now valued at fifteen thousand dollars.

The present elders are Joseph C. Magee, William H. Courter, C. W. Johnson, John Pierson, Alfred W. Dey, James P. De Hart, J. B. Tallman, and William H. Mount. The trustees are T. Wilton Hill, president; John D. Courter, secretary and treasurer; and Nelson B. Smock, Garret G. Davison, James Vanderripe, and Robert M. Cole.

The Presbyterian Sunday-school was organized in 1847, with Alexander Redmond as superintendent. John D. Buckelew has been superintendent since 1854. The membership is one hundred and sixty-five, exclusive of officers and teachers. The library contains about three hundred and fifty volumes. William H. Courter is first and J. C. Morgan second assistant superintendent. John D. Courter is secretary and treasurer, and Thomas J. Parks librarian.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, UNION VALLEY.—Rev. (better known years ago as "Daddy") Perkins, a circuit preacher, organized a class at Union Valley in 1840, with the following named persons as members: Brittain Clayton, Eliza Clayton, Lydia Robbins, Maria Rue, Matilda Jamison, Alfred Jamison, David Dey, Sarah Ann Dey, Mary Dey, Eliza Laning, Caroline Laning, and Daniel I. Dey.

During the ensuing year the class met weekly at the house of Daniel I. Dey, and services were led by Mr. Perkins. Local preachers held meetings more or less frequently during the succeeding five years, and in 1846 a wooden church, thirty feet by twenty-two, was built by subscription at a cost of about five hundred dollars. The present house of worship, a wooden building forty-four feet by thirty-six, was erected in 1866-67, also by subscription. The pulpit was filled by local preachers until 1867, when Rev. Elias D. Stults became pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. J. Leuppie, the present pastor, about three years since. The membership is eighty. The trustees are J. W. Stults, R. Applegate, J. L. Brown, G. McDowell, T. Hulit, George Dey, and R. I. Reed. John Wolf, George McDowell, and John M. Stults are stewards.

ST. JAMES THE LESS CATHOLIC CHURCH, JAMESBURG.—This church, on Lincoln Avenue, Jamesburg, was erected in 1878, on a lot donated for that purpose by the Bucklewe estate, and consecrated in December that year by Bishop Corrigan, now Archbishop of New York. The congregation was organized in 1865, and then consisted of ten families, including those of Richard Lewis, Patrick Pierce, John Coyne, Patrick Connaty, John Connaty, John Breene, and John Callahan, and meetings were held in private houses until the erection of the church. The congregation now numbers forty families.

The successive pastors have been Fathers O'Donnell, Moran, Kivolitz, and Joseph Russing.

A Sunday-school was organized in 1879 with fifty scholars. John Pierce was the first superintendent. The present superintendent is William Breene. The library contains one hundred and fifty volumes.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN PAXTON.

Edward Paxton, the grandfather of John, whose life is here briefly sketched, was of Irish birth, and having decided to seek a home on American shores, left his native city of Dublin and sailed (probably in the "Mayflower") for the New World. He chose Trenton, N. J., as a place of settlement, and there located as a shoemaker. He was married to Elizabeth Cunningham, of Trenton, and had children, nine in number, as follows: William, David, Hugh, Edward, John, Mary (Mrs. Clun), Elizabeth (Mrs. Lockard), Catherine, and Sally.

Edward, of this number, joined Gen. Montgomery's expedition, having as its purpose the storming of Quebec, and was while en route accidentally killed at St. John's by the bursting of a bomb.

John was born at Allentown, Monmouth Co., and after being apprenticed to a tailor removed to New York, where he pursued his trade. He later returned to Allentown and followed the same industry. Mr. Paxton was married to Theodosia Tindall, of New Jersey, and had children,—Catherine (Mrs. J. V. Anderson), Mary (Mrs. Peter Casler), Margaret, Elizabeth (Mrs. Peter Casler), William, Edward, John, and James. Mr. Paxton finally abandoned his trade and followed farming pursuits at Matchaponix, where he reared his family of children and lived until his death.

His son John was born at the latter place, May 3, 1813, and remained with his parents until his twenty-eighth year, having been engaged in labor upon the farm. He then decided upon the purchase of land, and with a capital of four hundred dollars secured a farm valued at two thousand four hundred dollars. Industry and frugality soon enabled him to liquidate the indebtedness upon the property, which he subsequently sold and removed to Trenton. Here he made a second purchase, and after a residence of eight years disposed of the land at an advance of thirteen thousand dollars. He then removed to Matchaponix, now Monroe township, Middlesex Co., where he still resides and is actively engaged in agricultural employments.

Mr. Paxton was married March 4, 1846, to Miss Theodosia, daughter of Daniel Ivins, of Mercer County, who is the mother of three children,—Eveline (Mrs. C. M. Johnson), Mary E. (Mrs. David Kirkpatrick), and Rebecca V.

Mr. Paxton is in his political views a Republican, and while a strong advocate of the principles of his party, is never an aspirant for party favors, his time and energies being given rather to his daily routine of farming avocations. HON. JOSEPH C. MAGEE.

Mr. Magee's progenitors were for many years residents of the north of Ireland, his grandfather having been Richard Magee, whose children were James, Erick, John, Jonathan, and Barbara, who became Mrs. Emmons.

Jonathan, one of these sons, was born near Freehold, Monmouth Co., and married Miss Mary Hulse, of the same county. Their children were Margaret, (Mrs. Stultze), James, William, Lydia (Mrs. Taylor), and Alfred.

Mr. Magee spent his life in farming pursuits, but at a later period removed to the home of his son in Jamesburg, where his death occurred.

Joseph C. Magee was born in Monmouth County, Oct. 8, 1821, and at the age of nine months was deprived by death of the tender care of a mother. His boyhood was passed with his father on the farm until his twelfth year, when he was apprenticed to Elias C. Clayton, of Manalapan, Monmouth Co. After a service of six years, and on attaining his eighteenth year, he engaged as a clerk for the same gentleman, and at the expiration of five years was admitted to a partnership. After a business connection of four years with Mr. Clayton he formed a copartnership with John E. Hunt, and three years later removed to Jamesburg, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits.

Mr. Magee was married in March, 1846, to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Daniel Van Artsdalen, of West Philadelphia, Pa., to whom were born children,—Harriet C. (Mrs. Perrine), Mary E. (Mrs. Finley), deceased, Eugene V., Anna B., and George, who died in infancy.

The death of Mrs. Magee occurred in 1866, and Mr. Magee was again married in April, 1871, to Mrs. Eleanor B. Perrine, of Monmouth County, who is the mother of one daughter, Alice.

Mr. Magee has during the whole of his life, and particularly since his residence in Jamesburg, been an active business man. He has contributed largely to the growth and enterprise of the place, having been instrumental in the erection of many of its dwellings.

In politics he may be mentioned as an Andrew Jackson Democrat. He was during the years 1874-75 a member of the State Legislature, and served on the important Committee on Railroads and Canals, of which he was chairman during the last year of his official service.

He has been for two years chosen freeholder of Monroe township, and held various other minor offices. He is president of the Jamesburg Mutual Building and Loan Association, a director of the Princeton Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and also one of the founders and a director of the First National Bank of Jamesburg. He has been active in the temperance organization of the village, and one of the chief promoters of the cause of temperance in the township.

Mr. Magee is a Presbyterian in his religious faith, and was one of the founders of the First Presbyterian Church of Jamesburg, of which he is both elder and trustee.

JAMES BUCKELEW.

The Buckelew family is of Scotch extraction, their progenitor in America having been Frederick Buckelew, a Scotch emigrant, who fled from his native land to avoid religious persecution. He sailed from Inverness, Scotland, in 1715, on the ship "Caledonia." It will be remembered that in 1711, shortly after the union of England and Scotland, patronage in the Presbyterian Church was re-established by royal command, ministers of the Church of Scotland being appointed by the government in the same manner as in the Church of England. Frederick Buckelew became identified with those who objected to the taking away of a right that the Scotch Church had enjoyed for over a century, and rather than be subjected to what he believed to be a wrong determined to leave his native land. He landed at Perth Amboy, in New Jersey, and a short time afterwards selected a permanent settlement near the present village of Jamesburg, Middlesex Co. His two sons were Frederick and John, the latter of whom was also born in Scotland, Feb. 14, 1705, and ten years of age when his father sailed to America. John subsequently married Isabel Dove, a Scotch lady, who was a passenger on the same vessel with the elder Frederick's family to America. Their children were Abram, James, Thomas, John, Samuel, Frederick, Jane, who became Mrs. Gilland; Percilla, who was Mrs. Westlack; and Mary, who became Mrs. Hollingshead.

Of this number Frederick was born Feb. 14, 1756, upon the fifty-first anniversary of his father's birth.

He married Margaret, daughter of William Dunn, of Staten Island, March 4, 1784, just after the close of the Revolution. They had eleven children,—Nancy, Frederick, Margaret, Mary, James, Robert, and five who died in childhood. James, who is the subject of this sketch, was born Aug. 13, 1801, in that portion of South Amboy township now known as Monroe township, Middlesex County. His early advantages of education were limited to the ordinary instruction afforded at a country school.

He entered into business at the age of twenty, and after eight years of experience married, Dec. 12, 1829, Margaret, daughter of Isaac G. Snedeker and Ann Salter, of Cranbury, N. J. Their children are Isaac Snedeker, John Dunn, Margaret S. (deceased), Frederick Lemuel, Mary G., married to George H. Townsend, of New Haven, Conn., and Ida (deceased).

James Buckelew at first engaged in milling and farming operations at the homestead bordering the Manalapan stream, four miles above Jamesburg, and in 1832 purchased the property at Jamesburg then known as "Gorden's Mills," and afterward called Buckelew's Mills until 1847. In 1846 the school district was divided, the trustees having refused to admit a colored boy to the school. This was a violation of Mr. Buckelew's views on a subject which a quarter of a century afterwards caused the great civil war, and he erected at his own expense a brick school-house, which was used by the district free of charge during his life. In it a stone was placed bearing the inscription, "Jamesburg," in honor of Mr. Buckelew's Christian name James.

The Camden and Amboy Railroad was being built when he removed to Jamesburg, and Mr. Buckelew was one of its few early friends. While the enemies of the road cried monopoly and ridiculed what they thought a wild and visionary scheme, he with the remarkable foresight that characterized so many acts of his life saw in the railroad the great civilizer of the nineteenth century, and welcomed the arrival of the iron horse.

Mr. Buckelew's milling and farming operations proved to be financially successful. His early introduction of that great New Jersey fertilizer, marl, on his farm lands in and around Jamesburg added greatly to the value of the many acres that he gradually accumulated. The marl was conveyed from the Squankum marl pits, near Farmingdale, about twenty miles from Jamesburg, and during the winter months one hundred mules were often employed in carting this valuable fertilizer to different portions of the Buckelew farms. With the completion of the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Delaware and Raritan Canal, in 1834, the tide of passenger travel from Philadelphia to New York via South Amboy, and the carrying of freight by canal via Bordentown, New Brunswick, to New York, began, and during the next five or six years the business rapidly developed. In 1840, Mr. Buckelew obtained the contract for team-towing on the canal, which he continued for twenty-five years. This business increased proportionally with the great freight traffic on the canal, and at the time of his transfer of interest to other parties in 1866 seven hundred mules were employed on the forty-three miles of tow-path between Bordentown and New Brunswick. In 1845 he in connection with Nathaniel S. Rue, Esq., now President of the First National Bank of Hightstown, N. J., established a stage-route between Jamesburg and Freehold, it being the first link in the chain of the great route from Philadelphia to Manasquan, Ocean Grove, and Long Branch.

This became a very popular route, and carried five thousand and seventy-four passengers during the second year, as many as thirty coaches being run in one day during the height of the summer travel between Philadelphia and Long Branch. His ideas of personal advancement, even in this particular, yielded to the public good, and in 1851 he was first and foremost in his efforts to establish the Freehold and Jamesburg Agricultural Railroad, giving it the right to his stage-route in 1853, when the road was opened, free of charge. As time advanced the value of marl as a fertilizer began to be realized by the farming community, and the demand for it by persons living at a distance led him to undertake the construction of a railroad from Freehold, nine miles, to the Squankum marl pits. This road was opened for travel in 1869, after a most bitter opposition from those who were not willing to sacrifice personal interest for a great public good. At the beginning of the war Mr. Buckelew placed himself on the roll of earnest friends of the government.

When the national banking law went into effect, in 1862, he was among the first to see its advantages, and in 1864 established the First National Bank of Jamesburg, of which institution he was a director until the day of his death. Mr. Buckelew was also a pioneer in the cultivation of cranberries, which has developed into one of the most important industries of the State. The extensive bogs, which during the picking season afford employment to hundreds of persons, are on the north side of the railroad from Jamesburg to South Amboy, and embrace perhaps the largest single tract of land now in cranberry culture in the State. These were laid out and cultivated to a limited extent during Mr. Buckelew's lifetime, and have become one of the most valuable legacies to his children. Mr. Buckelew possessed a well-balanced mind, an indomitable will, and a firmness of purpose which, in the Scotch character, is nearly allied to stubbornness. He was a man of much public spirit, and all projects which resulted in benefit to the public received hearty encouragement from him. In his efforts for the public good he was frequently involved in legal contests, and his advanced ideas did not at all times receive the cordial sympathy they merited. A man of deeds rather than words, the utility of his various projects was demonstrated more by successful accomplishment than plausible argument.

Liberal without ostentation, the land for the Presbyterian Church parsonage and cemetery were among his gifts to Jamesburg. Among his friends, of whom he had many, his advice and counsel was frequently asked, and his residence at Jamesburg was for many years the headquarters where were frequently assembled those who were prominent and instrumental in the construction of railroads and other improvements. About his table were discussed many of the early plans of the managers of the pioneer railway between New York and Philadelphia, the direct management of which was given to his son, Col. Isaac S. Buckelew, when the Pennsylvania Railroad leased the United Railways of New Jersey in 1871, and who was superintendent of the Freehold and Jamesburg Railway from the date of its completion.

The historian who desires to record the acts of the men who are identified with the progress of the times is apt to select those whose political experience, scientific knowledge, or early surroundings have placed them upon a plane higher than their fellows. The subject of this sketch, however, rose to a place in the front rank of the citizens of Middlesex County without any of these substantial aids. While having strong political convictions, being first a Whig and then a Republican, he never aspired to place or power, though the aid he rendered the cause which he espoused was valuable, and recognized as such by his political friends. His advantages of education, while of the most ordinary character, were sufficient to develop a kind of mental strength peculiar in character, but invaluable to those who are endowed with it, a discernment by which he was able to judge in advance and act in accordance with his judgment.

With no distinguished ancestry to point to with pride, he chose to earn the esteem of his contemporaries and to point to the future consummation of his plans. In all his business relations he observed the strictest probity, and at his death on the 30th of May, 1869, had amassed a considerable fortune, which he accumulated by unusual sagacity in his financial operations. Not one cent of this came to him by means that were ever questionable.

Mr. Buckelew's remains were interred at Fernwood Cemetery, in Jamesburg, on the land that originally belonged to his great-grandfather. A substantial monument marks the last resting-place of one to whom the people of Middlesex and adjoining counties owe much of the prosperity which they enjoy.

Situation and Boundaries.—Madison is situated on the eastern border of Middlesex County, somewhat south of the centre, and is a little more than eight miles long, measuring from its northern to its southeastern extremity, its average width being four miles or thereabout. It is bounded north by South Amboy and Raritan Bay; southeast by Matawan, Marlborough, and Manalapan townships, Monmouth County; southwest by Monroe; and northwest by East Brunswick and South Amboy.

Physical Features.—The area of Madison is 19,560 acres, and much of it is quite heavily wooded. The surface is rolling, and broken by several streams.

The largest stream flowing through any portion of the township is Cheesquake Creek, rising in the northern part and emptying into the Raritan at the northwestern corner, forming for a short distance the boundary line between Madison and South Amboy. The Cheesquake has its source in several smaller streams rising about Jacksonville and flowing together a little north of that village, and is navigable nearly to its head-waters.

Deep Run, a mill stream of considerable importance, is fed by several little streams rising or having their sources mostly in the eastern part of the township, their confluence being within a short distance of their several sources. This creek affords good water-power in the western part of Madison, and empties its waters into South River just northwest of the township line.

Tenant's Creek rises south of Jacksonville, and flowing northwest empties into South River near where the latter receives Deep Run, providing a good water-power not far from the boundary line.

Iresick Brook is formed by the confluence of Grog Brook and another unimportant rivulet southwest of Deep Run, and flows into South River near the Brookfield Mills.

Matchaponix Creek and South River wash about two-thirds of the western border of the township, and the juxtaposition of the latter has been a source of material prosperity to its inhabitants.

Barclay's Brook is a small tributary to the Matchaponix, near the southern extremity of the township.

That portion of Madison bordering on Monmouth County is considerably elevated above those portions lying contiguous to South Amboy, East Brunswick, and Monroe, and the land there is more valuable for agricultural purposes than that watered by the streams referred to. The soil is composed of red shale and sandy loam, and west of Cheesquake Creek are located some extensive and valuable beds of fire and potter's clay, which is a leading article of commerce.

The timber native to Madison is pine, cedar, maple, ash, and nearly all the various kinds of oak. Some of it has been found well adapted to ship-building purposes, and has at times commanded a ready and profitable sale. The smaller trees have been extensively cut into wood, and so sold in immense quantities.

The Camden and Amboy branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad runs along the northwestern border of the township for quite a distance, Old Bridge, Spottswood, and Bloomfield Mills being convenient stations.

The two principal highways are the Mount Pleasant and Old Bridge turnpike and the South Amboy and Mount Pleasant road, which form a junction near the eastern border, between Jacksonville and Matawan, Monmouth Co.

Early Settlement.—On account of the intimate natural and business connection which has so long existed between Amboy and the region bordering on the Cheesquake, the carrying trade by way of that stream forming the connecting link, settlement and improvement naturally began at Jacksonville and near the head of navigation. It was in that vicinity, on the Old Bridge road and in the Browntown neighborhood, that most of the pioneers located. The most diligent inquiry has in most cases failed to elicit any definite information as to the dates of the settlement of the few who were pioneers in Madison, and in some instances it is not certain that the fathers of some who are supposed to have been pioneers did not come into the township previous to the latter's birth.

The first land-owners in Madison were not settlers there, and probably purchased the land which bordered on the Cheesquake and Raritan Bay with a view to disposing of it advantageously at some future time, when the manifest advantages offered by the section for commercial transactions should render it desirable property to enterprising settlers. By some of these grantees this hope was doubtless realized to a certain extent, but it is probable none of them had in view the future value of the sand and clay, which could not at that time have been regarded as particularly desirable. It is thought, rather, that the contiguity of these lands to Perth Amboy, then looked upon as the future metropolis of the New World, and with some show of reason, and their convenience to navigable waters, were the considerations upon which was based a conviction of their ultimate value.

On "Reid's map" of the Raritan and South Rivers and the country bordering them and for some distance inland, which was made some time between 1683 and 1686 by John Reid, deputy surveyor under Keith, several tracts of land are shown at the mouth of Cheesquake Creek and along its eastern shore and south of its source as belonging to "T. L." and S. Winder (1000 acres), Scots' Proprietors (1000 acres), T. Warne² (1000 acres), "Scots' Proprietors with

William Decway" (1000 acres), and William Decway (1000 acres), portions of which must have been in the township as at present bounded.

David Owens settled not far from Jacksonville about 1730. He had one son (2), David, who married and had a son and daughter named Peter and Rosannah. (3) Peter married a Miss Lamberson, descended from another pioneer family, and had a son, whose name is thought to have been Harriou, and who died young. He has been dead about forty years, probably, as he is said not to have long survived his father, who died about fifty years ago. (4) Rosannah married John Prest and lived in the township. Peter Owens lived about a mile from Jacksonville on the road to South Amboy, where his widow lived after his death, owning a farm by inheritance from her father, James Lamberson, which embraced the present clay banks of Whitehead Brothers.

A man named Ward was early in the neighborhood of Jacksonville. He was a boatman and hunter, and died at the age of eighty or thereabouts early in the present century. He was a great hunter of water-fowl, and is said to have spent a good part of his time searching in the sedges and marshes and up and down the streams of Madison and the adjacent country in quest of his favorite game. To facilitate his journeyings to and fro he had a frail, portable canoe, which he carried on his shoulders overland from creek to creek. His gun is said to have been a curiosity in its way, very long, very heavy, and very true to its aim in the experienced hands of its owner.

David Hall was an early comer and located on the road from Jacksonville to Matawan, Monmouth Co., and has been dead since the early part of the century. One of his sons, named William, died in 1811; John R., another, in 1819. His sons, Stephen and Courtney, were well known in that part of the county, and both have long been dead. The latter married a daughter of Thomas Lamberson. David Hall had several daughters also, one of whom married a prominent ship-builder of New York, and after his death returned to Madison, where she died.

(1) Andrew Bound settled in Monmouth County in 1760. His sons were David, Obadiah, and Andrew. The latter removed to Staten Island. (2) David came to Madison about 1800, and owned a large tract of land on the Raritan Bay shore, and has been dead many years. He married Catharine Morgan, a sister of Gen. James Morgan, by whom he had a daughter, who married William Jaques. His second wife was a sister of Clarkson Brown, and bore him three children, of whom only Clarkson Bound is living; Rhoda, a daughter, married a son of Parker Brown; (3) Obadiah married a Miss Newton and lived near David. James and David were his sons.

The father of Gen. James Morgan early interested himself in the fortunes of Jacksonville, where he was largely interested in lands extending along the Cheesquake to its mouth, and was a manufacturer of potter's wares before the Revolution. Gen. James Morgan later was also a large property-owner and manufacturer in the same line. He removed to Old Bridge, and was prominent in business affairs there. Much of the property once owned by the elder Morgan is now in possession of his descendants, some of whom are residents of South Amboy. The Morgan clay-beds are on this tract.

An early settler on the J. V. L. Gordon property was Obadiah Buckalew, a farmer and speculator in woodlands, timber, and wood, shipping extensively from South Amboy and Jacksonville. His son, Obadiah Buckalew, Jr., married a daughter of Ephraim Rose, of Jacksonville. One of his daughters married Jaques Van Liew Gordon, and survives him. Mr. Gordon was a son of Peter Gordon, of Milltown, North Brunswick, and a grandson of Archibald Gordon, of Matchaponix. He was a speculator in lands, and served Middlesex County as sheriff, 1851-54, and the township of South Amboy as freeholder, with but two interregnums aggregating only six years, 1842-70, dying only a few years ago.

Thomas Warne settled on the Mount Pleasant and Old Bridge turnpike previous to 1800, purchasing a tract of one thousand acres, much of which is now owned by numerous descendants. (1) John Morgan located on the old road from Jacksonville to Matawan. William, Samuel, and perhaps others were his sons. (2) William was a blacksmith near Browntown, and died there. Daniel Morgan, blacksmith, and Charles Morgan, of Washington, are his sons. (3) Samuel lived and died on the homestead.

An early resident who was once familiar to nearly all of the leading men in the country about Amboy was (1) Wyannt Wood, who came to Madison in 1800, and spent the balance of his life there. His children were William, Timothy, John, Peter, Caroline, Sophia, Matilda, Gertrude, and Elmira. (2) Timothy was a militia officer, and was sometimes called "Col." Wood. He married Sarah Lamberson, and had sons, — Timothy and David. The latter married a daughter of Ambrose Maxfield, of South Amboy. (3) John married Mary Ann Bennit, and located near Jacksonville, at the landing, and is living at the age of eighty-nine. His children were Cornelia, Mary, and John. Cornelia married Abraham Warne, Mary married Hezekiah Warne, and John married Lucinda Martin. (4) Peter lives in New York, and is eighty years old.

On South River, near Old Bridge, Edward Furman was an early settler, dying about fifty years ago. His son Noah removed to Madison many years ago, and was during an extended period speculating in woodlands and dealing in wood, which he shipped in immense quantities from Jacksonville, Old Bridge, South Amboy, and elsewhere. He died in 1832. His sons were Noah, William, and George. Noah is a prominent business man of South Amboy. William is dead. George remained in Madison.

(1) Whitehead Brown located early at Browntown, owning much land there, and dying many years ago. His only son was (2) Abraham W. Brown, who was sheriff of Middlesex County, 1836-39. The latter married a daughter of Ebenezer Price, of Sayreville, and died some years ago. His sons, Hendrick and Whitehead, are living. (3) Hendrick, known later in life as ex-Judge Brown, married a Miss Crowell, of Perth Amboy, and is living on the homestead farm. (4) Whitehead lives in Monmouth County. One of the daughters of this family married James Bissett, now a brick manufacturer between Old Bridge and Washington, in East Brunswick. Another became the wife and is now the widow of Dr. Cross, of Monmouth County. Well-known Browns in Madison and around about have been Daniel, Joshua, Clarkson, and Dr. Jacob Brown.

The Hilliers were among the early comers to Madison. Probably the best known of the family was Col. Nathaniel Hillier, born in the Browntown neighborhood (where his father was before him), who lived in Jacksonville, keeping tavern, holding public offices, and dying some years ago aged about threescore and ten. He was twice married,—to Euphemia Rose, daughter of Timothy Rose, and to a daughter of Jacob Martin.

"Squire" Samuel Pitney was early on the Ten Eyck farm.

Egbert Wright was a blacksmith at Jacksonville early in this century, and died there somewhat less than fifty years ago. His son William was his successor, both in his house and his shop, living until a few years ago.

Lewis Josiah Buckalew emigrated to this country from Bokoloh, Hanover, and settled in what is now Madison, and Josiah Burlew, son of Lewis Josiah Burlew (for they then were known as Burlew), was in the Revolutionary war, and presented the army with a team of horses, which were killed at the battle of Monmouth. He returned home at the close of the war, married, and had two sons, Richard and George, both of whom married. Richard took the farm, and George went to New York City. Richard had two sons, Josiah by his first wife, and Martin Lewis by his second wife. George had one son, Richard, who was an importer of china in Pearl Street, New York. The Burlew farm contains one hundred and fifty-three acres, extending from the main road from Jacksonville to South Amboy to Cheesquake Creek.

Mulford Martin, Jr., was also for many years a blacksmith at Jacksonville. Mulford Martin, Sr., was, however, the pioneer in the township of the name. He was early in life a resident of Piscataway, and subsequently lived for a time at South Amboy before locating in Madison.

Capt. William Clark, farmer and boatman, came to the head of navigation in this township at a comparatively early date. His wife was a sister of ex-Sheriff Asher Bissett. His son Obadiah married a daughter of Ephraim Rose, and was sheriff of Middlesex County, 1860-63.

Benjamin R. Seaman, now about seventy years with "the great majority," had for many years previous to his death resided on a farm near Jacksonville. He is remembered as a man of fine presence and courtly address.

David Provost, a farmer, lived near Seaman, and died about sixty years ago.

Rily Bennit was a boat-captain in the pioneer days of the carrying trade, living near the present residence of John Wood.

Jonathan and Francis Bloodgood came early to Madison, and have descendants living there and in adjoining townships. They were boatmen and small land-owners, and have been dead many years.

Organization.—By an act of the General Assembly of New Jersey, approved March 2, 1869, the township of Madison was erected from the township of South Amboy.

The inhabitants within the boundaries were constituted "a body politic and corporate in law, to be known as the inhabitants of the township of Madison, in the county of Middlesex, and the act provided that the first town-meeting of the new township should be held at the inn of Robert L. Skillman, in the village of Jacksonville, on the second Sunday in March, 1869. The following is a list of the principal officers who have since served the township:

Villages and Hamlets.—JACKSONVILLE.—The only place in Madison which has the slightest claim to the name of village is Jacksonville, on the South Amboy and Mount Pleasant road, at the head of Cheesquake Creek, and lying mostly in the forks of two little brooks which run together and expand into that stream.

This place was early known as Cheesquake, and bore that name until rechristened Jacksonville, probably in honor of Gen. Andrew Jackson.¹ Settlement begun there very early, and the place had attained to its present proportions years ago under the influence of the carrying trade early established upon the Cheesquake, navigable to that point.

Several of the earlier residents there were men of means and enterprise. They purchased large tracts of land there and thereabout, and engaged extensively in the timber and wood trade. When this commerce was assured, they made and lost much money in speculating in lands.

Before the days of railroads the water traffic along South River and the Cheesquake was something immense, large quantities of produce and merchandise designed for shipment to New York being brought to the various landings from far inland by teams for transfer to vessels, and after the beginning of the reign of the "iron horse" there was for a time sharp competition between the railroaders and the boatmen for the transportation business. Ship-yards were common throughout the whole section watered by the navigable portions of these streams and the Raritan, and timbers suitable for ship-building was in good demand and brought a fair price. In the advantages afforded by this traffic Jacksonville participated to a considerable degree. The docks there were scenes of life and activity, and as at other places similarly conditioned, half of the population were watermen and their families.

The clay beds in the vicinity were early utilized for manufacturing purposes, and potteries were in operation at Jacksonville for many years.

To an inland port as to a seaport, public-houses have ever been found to be a necessity. Of these Jacksonville, considering its size and present pretensions, has had its share.

The pioneer tavern was the old Cheesquake hotel, and the father of Gen. James Morgan was its proprietor. This hostelry was established about the middle of the last century. It was early known as the Morgan House, and has had many keepers, finally coming into the possession of Robert S. Skillman, the present proprietor.

The Hillier House was erected some time prior to 1828, and presided over by Col. Nathaniel Hillier until his death, about 1860. Then the property passed to the possession of the colonel's son, who removed it from the old site and converted it into a dwelling.

The memory of the Lamberson tavern is recalled from time to time by the old men about the village. It closed its doors forever as a public-house half a century ago.

For many years, up to about 1850, Stephen Hall's old tavern was a favorite place of resort to the men of a former period.

The earliest merchant of Jacksonville of whom present residents have any knowledge was Stephen Hall, who had a grocery there as early as 1825.

For a number of years, dating from 1830, A. J. Disbrow (now sheriff), of Old Bridge, was a leading merchant and business man.

Courtney Hall was trading there as early as 1828 or 1830, and for some time later.

The present merchants are Martin C. Burlew and Stephen Hall.

The village now contains two stores, two blacksmith's shops, one public-house, a Baptist Church,² a Methodist Church, a school-house, and about twenty dwellings. The two blacksmiths are A. O. Smith and Paul Yanson.

In 1840 a post-office was established at Jacksonville, with Col. Nathaniel Hillier as postmaster; but it was abolished a few years later.

BROWNTOWN is a neighborhood—for it can scarcely be denominated a hamlet—on the Mount Pleasant and Old Bridge turnpike. It received the appellation by which it is known from the early and long residence there of families of the name of Brown, and embraces the store of C. J. Eaton, the blacksmith-shop of W. Palmer, a school-house, and a few dwellings.

Statistics, Taxation, and Expenditures.—In 1880 the total value of real estate in Madison was $320,075. The personal property was assessed at $80,000. The total taxable valuation was $350,000. There were 314 voters. The school-tax amounted to $551; the county tax to $1687. The population was 1662.

The following is an exhibit of the sums raised in the township each year since its organization for the uses specified:

² On the ground now occupied by the Baptist Church there was a log cabin, used by the Primitive or Old-School Baptists, before the erection of the first church. The present house of worship was built and dedicated in 1832.

Schools.—The earliest schools within the present borders of Madison were kept at Jacksonville and Browntown. The date when the first school was opened cannot be ascertained. The first school-houses were very primitive affairs, and were built by subscription.

The teachers were of the old-fashioned migratory sort for the most part, and their names are gone from the memory of any one now living in the township. These schools were supported, when they were kept open, by the payment of tuition fees by the parents of the pupils directly to the teachers.

Under the public school system the township was divided into districts of convenient dimensions, and as the population increased and new portions were occupied, their number and boundaries underwent successive changes.

In 1881 the school districts of this township were seven in number, designated as Nos. 65 to 71, inclusive, of the school districts of Middlesex County, and known locally as "Jacksonville" District, No. 65; "Morristown" District, No. 66; "Old Bridge" District, No. 67; "Browntown" District, No. 68; "Cedar Grove" District, No. 69; "Millbridge" District, No. 70; and "Hillsborough" District, No. 71.

In 1880 there were 484 children of the school age in Madison, 83 of whom resided in District No. 65, 73 in No. 66, 86 in No. 67, 55 in No. 68, 69 in No. 69, 50 in No. 70, and 65 in No. 71.

It was estimated that 12 children attended private schools, and that there were 105 who did not avail themselves of the educational advantages offered.

There were 3 male and 4 female teachers employed, the former at an average monthly salary of $32, the latter at an average monthly salary of $35. The schools were kept open an average of nine months during the year.

The total valuation of school property was $6050, divided as follows among the several districts: Districts Nos. 65 and 67, $1200 each; Districts Nos. 66 and 71, $400 each; District No. 68, $2000; District No. 69, $350; and District No. 70, $500.

The amount of apportionment to each district from the State appropriation was $349.62 to District No. 65, and $300 each to Districts Nos. 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, and 71. The total amount of district tax ordered to be raised in District No. 65 was $150. The total amount received from all sources for public school purposes in the several districts was $2299.62.

District No. 69 has the nucleus of a library fund.

The Methodist Episcopal Church.—There are no records in existence that the more active members of this church know of that will throw any light on the early history of this body. Old members say that it was organized at an early date, within the limits of the township of South Amboy, which at that time embraced Madison.

After the organization of the society the congregation met in the old Baptist Church at Jacksonville until they could erect a house of worship, which now stands about in the centre of the village, and is of the old-fashioned order of architecture.

The church was built by subscription, and is valued at $800. The parsonage, with a small body of land, cost $1000.

For a number of years this church has been without a pastor, but the pulpit is now supplied by Rev. Samuel¹ Crissburn, a local preacher.

Burial-Places.—There are only two regular burial-places in this township, and these have been in use for many years. They are located in the churchyards of the Baptist and Methodist Churches at Jacksonville.

The older of the two is the Baptist burying-ground, and in it are buried members of pioneer families about the Cheesquake and its head-waters. The bones of others who came into the township at a period little, if any, later lie in the Methodist graveyard.

In both burial-places are graves unmarked by monument or headstone, and inscriptions which were placed over some have become so illegible by long exposure to wind and storm as to be totally undecipherable. In the Baptist churchyard is a low headstone, of common brown field-stone, which challenges attention and arouses conjecture in the mind of the beholder as to when and to whose memory it was set up. On it are rudely chiselled in one line the letters R, E, n, R (reversed), and a hieroglyphic composed of a curved line and two sides of a triangle, joined in such a manner as to suggest a thought of the figure 6. Underneath this line and parallel with it are the letters D (reversed) and A. Two other stones of similar appearance in the yard bear the legends "R. O." and "D. O. S. C." respectively.¹

On headstones in the Baptist burying-ground are the following names and dates of the death of persons buried there from 1798 to 1825:

"Martha, daughter of Seth and Martha Ellison, and wife of Obediah Burlew, born November 23rd, 1729, died May 9th, 1798."

"Obadiah, son of Peter Burlew, October 9th, 1802."

"Eleanor, daughter of Samuel and Catharine Burlew, 1814, aged 37."

"T. Rose, August 24, 1820."

"Abigail, daughter of Obediah and Elizabeth Burlew, May 20th, 1822."

"Susann, wife of Richard Burlew, April 2nd, 1825."

"Mellenuey, wife of Joshua Warne, May 10th, 1892, aged 58."

"Sacred to the memory of Thomas Clark, who departed this life July 30th, 1805, aged 68 years, 25 days.
My flesh shall rest in hope."

"Mary, wife of William Warne, June 14th, 1809, aged 34."

"William, son of David and Hannah Hall, June 20th, 1811."

"In Memory of William Warn,
Who departed this life March 20th, 1812, aged 43 years.
Come listen all to my call,
Which I do make to-day;
For you must die as well as I,
And pass from thence away."

"Joshua Warne, February 10th, 1814, aged 73 years, 1 month, and 23 days."

"John R., son of Stephen and Sarah Hall, April 19th, 1819."

"Sacred to the memory of Elizabeth Herbert,
Who departed this life February 2nd, 1822, aged 85.
Beneath this stone a body lies,
No more to mourne, but yet to rise,
And still to roam amongst the skies,
Where God is known that never dies."

"Nancy, wife of Francis Bloodgood, June, 13, 1828."

"In memory of Noah Furman, who departed this life in 1832."

It was in the year of thirty-two,
Which mournful date will show,
A husband dear and kind to me,
Died with that dreadful cholera."

During the past few years some families in Madison have buried their dead at Old Bridge and Spottswood.

Industrial Pursuits.—The wood and timber trade, elsewhere referred to, was early and long a prominent industry in Madison, and the carrying business from Jacksonville and another old landing on South River, opposite Old Bridge, afforded profitable employment to many, and was a source of considerable pecuniary gain to a few enterprising citizens.

THE CLAY INTERESTS.—The Amboy clay mines of Otto Ernst are in this township, near the head of Cheesquake Creek. The stoneware clay on this property was opened at first by digging and sinking pits in the upland, where it sloped to the tide meadows south of Mr. Ernst's residence, and southeast of the mines since worked. Several years later the then proprietors began mining on a small scale, sinking shafts and removing the clay by short horizontal drifts in the clay bed. In 1868, Mr. Ernst came into possession of the property, and continued this system of mining on a more extensive scale. New shafts were put down, west and northwest of the old bank and old shafts, and nearer the centre of the small valley in which all the clay workings in the vicinity are located. Three of them, put down in 1868, 1872, and 1876, respectively, are in line east and west, and their vertical sections are as follows:

(1) yellow sand and gravel, 7 feet; (2) "black stuff" (sandy earth, lignite, and pyrite), 2 feet; (3) blue quicksand, 5 feet; (4) good clay, 4½ feet; (5) good clay (red streaks at top), main drift, 8 feet; (6) good clay, 4 feet. The bottom is at high-water level. The stoneware-bed includes (4), (5), and (6), or a thickness of 16½ feet. The place of the drift is represented by (5), while (4) is left as a roof, and (6) as flooring to the mine.

The middle shaft, put down in 1868, is 100 feet east of that above described, and 240 feet west of that of 1876. In this the stratification is as follows:

(1) yellow sand and gravel, 13½ feet; (2) sandy earth, containing lignite, 2 feet; (3) blue quicksand, 3 feet; (4) good clay, 3 feet; (5) sandy clay, 2 feet; (6) dark-colored clay, 2 feet; (7) red clay, 2 feet; (8) good clay (main drift), 9 feet; (9) good clay, 5 feet; (10) clay (boring), 13 feet.

The top of the drift (8) is three feet above high-water level. Here the worked portion of the bed is represented by (8), but, as this section shows, there is good clay five feet under it.

The following is the order of succession of the strata and their thickness in the east shaft, sunk in 1876:

(1) yellow sand and gravel, 17 feet; (2) quicksand, 3½ feet; (3) blue gravel, 2 feet; (4) good clay (lower 6 feet main drift), 10 feet; (5) sandy clay, 5 feet; (6) black stuff, 2 feet.

The top of the good clay (4) is four feet above high-water level. Most of (5) and (6) were determined by borings.

The composition of the best average clay in these mines is as follows:

Alumina, 20.20; silicic acid, 28.80; water combined, 5.80; sand (quartz), 39.95; titanic acid, .90; potash, 1.58; soda, —; lime, traces; magnesia, .50; sesquioxide of iron, 1.45; water (moisture), 1.20. Total, 100.38. The specific gravity of this clay is 1.971 to 2.138. It has the "fly-speckled" appearance characteristic in this stoneware clay bed. The sand in it is very fine-grained quartz. Mr. Ernst's practice has been to keep his mining considerably ahead of the immediate demands, keeping a large stock of clay on hand, which, in his opinion, has been improved by some months' exposure. The mining operations have consisted in sinking vertical shafts to the clay substratum, and the removal of the clay by a system of horizontal drifts, the ventilation being effected through a board flue built up in one corner of the shaft, and running from the surface down to within three feet of the bottom. A current of air is created by the heat of two or three kerosene lamps burning at the lower end of the flue. As the clay bed is impervious to water, and the shafts which cut the overlying strata are water-tight, there is practically no water to be raised, except that which comes in as the result of occasional unavoidable accidents. The clay thus obtained is carted half a mile to Mr. Ernst's dock on Cheesquake Creek, and shipped to all points on the Atlantic coast from Maine to Texas. It is known in the market as "mine clay," in distinction from "pit clay."

About half a mile southeast of Ernst's mines is the old bank of Noah Furman, which was described in the report of the State geological survey of 1855 as showing: (1) sand, 3 to 10 feet; (2) black clay, 10 to 15 feet; (3) stoneware clay, 14 feet. This bank has not been worked much since the report referred to was made. The top black clay includes in its mass a great deal of lignite and pyrite.

The clay bank of the Morgan estate is situated southwest of the above-described locality and at the border of the marsh. According to the same report this bank cut the following-named materials: (1) sand, 15 to 16 feet; (2) black clay, 7 feet; (3) stoneware clay, 10 feet.

No work has been done here lately. At this and the last-mentioned bank the clay was found partly below tide-water level.

Near the old Morgan bank, and about a mile northwest of Jacksonville, are the clay mines of Noah Furman, which were opened about 1867. They are in the upland, near the marsh, and the surface is twenty to thirty feet above mean high-tide level. In one of the shafts the top of the stoneware clay is found at an elevation of twenty feet; in a second shaft, one hundred yards west of the first, it was at nearly the same height,—19.5 feet above the same plane. The surface here is sand and gravel; then there is a black clay full of wood and pyrite, and containing some leaf impressions, three to six feet thick; then the stoneware clay, five to seven feet, and at the bottom a white sand. The extraction here is mostly by underground tunneling or mining proper. A vertical shaft is sunk to the bottom of the clay bed, and drifts generally one hundred feet long are cut from it into the clay, which is in this manner taken out. By means of a succession of such drifts the bed is worked out, excepting a stratum left at the top as a roof and another at the bottom as a floor. This clay has the same characteristic physical qualities that belong to the stoneware clays in general. The specific gravity is 2.012 to 2.022, and it is, on the average, a little more sandy than that taken out at Ernst's mines. A selected specimen has the chemical composition represented in the following analysis:

Alumina, 21.13; silicic acid, 29.23; water (combined), 6.81; sand (quartz), 37.85; titanitic acid, 1.00; potash, 1.81; soda, 0.18; lime, —; magnesia, 0.22; sesquioxide of iron, 1.68; water (moisture), 0.69; total, 100.60.

This clay, also known in the market as "mine clay," has been sold for stoneware, being carted to the dock on the creek, whence it is transported to various points by water.

Theodore Smith's clay pits are half a mile east of the Camden and Amboy Railroad, and a mile and a half northeast of Jacksonville. The ground here and towards the south is 30 to 40 feet high, rather flat, and drained by the head-waters of a small brook, a tributary to South River. The bearing of the clay is about 9 feet thick, of which the surface layer, 2 feet thick, is a moulding sand. The remaining 7 feet is common yellow sand. The top of the clay bed has an average elevation above tide-level of 40 feet, its thickness being between 3 and 10 feet. The top spit is very sandy, and is thrown aside as waste. Towards the bottom also it grows sandy, and under it there is a laminated sand and sandy clay. There is some pyrite and lignite in the lower part of the bed. All of the clay is carefully sorted so as to avoid the pyrite, which occurs occasionally in all parts of the bed. Most of the clay dug in these pits is sold for stoneware and shipped by rail.

Charles B. Reynolds' pits are near the head of Jernee's mill-pond, about two miles southwest of Jacksonville. The surface of the ground hereabout is flat, and does not exceed 30 feet in height above tide-water. The clay dug here is covered by a sandy loam and yellow sand to the depth of 3 feet. It is 5 feet thick and quite sandy, and near the surface streaked with yellow earth. The best is drab-colored, sandy, and dries quite white, and is lacking in the speckled appearance observable in some of the stoneware clays previously described. Only a few small pits have been dug. The clay from these has been carted to a pottery at Matawan, Monmouth Co., where it has been mixed with Furman's clay in making stoneware.

The excavation and traffic in the clays in Madison began early, and has continued more or less extensively to the present time, affording employment to many men in mining and transporting it, and taking rank commercially above every other interest. It has made possible the manufacture of pottery in the vicinity of the beds, which in the past, as will be seen by reference to other pages, has been carried on to a considerable extent. The lands containing it are very valuable, and must grow more so in proportion as the demand for such clays increases through the more and more extensive sale of the domestic wares and bricks manufactured from them.

PRE-REVOLUTIONARY ENTERPRISES.—At a date probably considerably anterior to the Revolution a paper-mill was established on the site of Skinner's Tecumseh Snuff-Mills. It is stated on good authority that at this mill was manufactured the paper on which the Continental money was printed which was issued by governmental authority during the struggle of the colonies for independence.

This property seems to have been in three portions, the first of which was transferred by Samuel Neilson to James Dorset and John Earhart, June 20, 1786; and the second by Garret Dennis to the same, March 5, 1792. The third passed from William Searle and Margaret Kenous to Messrs. Dorset and Earhart, who by its purchase became possessed of the entire property. Later, portions of the property seem to have passed to other hands, but the lot containing the "paper-mill and other buildings and houses" attracted the attention of Messrs. Phineas Mundy, Lewis Carman, and James Bishop, who purchased the interest in it of James Dorset, deceased, from his widow, at the time the wife of Peter Wilmurt. May 17, 1821, John Earhart, mother and sister, the heirs of John Earhart, deceased, disposed of their interest to Cornelius Johnson, from whom it was sold by the sheriff July 21st following, and bought by Messrs. Mundy, Carman, and Bishop, who thus obtained a title to the entire paper-mill property. May 26, 1825, Phineas Mundy bought the interest of James Bishop, and June 1st following that of Lewis Carman, becoming some owner. From him the property passed to Phineas M. Skinner, Jan. 9, 1854.

There was a pottery near the head of Cheesquake Creek before the Revolution, which was owned and operated by the father of the late Gen. James Morgan.

THE TECUMSEH SNUFF-MILLS.—The Tecumseh Snuff-Mills were established in May, 1854, by Phineas M. Skinner & Son, on the old paper-mill property, which Phineas M. Skinner had purchased of Phineas Mundy on the 9th of the preceding January.

In 1872, Mr. William A. Skinner succeeded the firm of Skinner & Son, subsequently admitting Lewis E. Skinner to a partnership in the business, the title of the firm changing to Skinner & Co.

At these mills about one hundred thousand pounds of tobacco are annually converted into snuff, and eight hands are employed. The machinery is turned by a water-power equal to that of seventy-five horses. The works are situated on the Matchaponix, in the western part of the township, and about three-quarters of a mile from the centre of the village of Spottswood, East Brunswick, in a northeasterly direction, and consist of a drying-house, thirty-two by thirty-five feet; a mill, twenty-five by thirty-five feet; a curing- and packing-house, thirty by sixty-five feet; and a fermenting-house, twenty-five by thirty feet, with a wing attached, thirteen by thirteen feet, occupied as an office, all ranging in height from a story to a story and a half.

MANUFACTURES AT "BLOOMFIELD."—On the site of the Bloomfield Mills, about midway between Old Bridge and Spottswood, on South River, Messrs. Embley & Keyser began the manufacture of powder about 1805. After a number of years Jacob R. Hardenbergh purchased the property and established a large saw-mill thereon, continuing to manufacture powder till 1833, when the concern blew up. He did an extensive lumber business for some years, and the property passed into the possession of his son, Cornelius L. Hardenbergh, who, after manufacturing lumber a few years, sold out the water-power and lands connected therewith to Anthony C. Rosier, of New York, who introduced the manufacture of linseed oil there, the business being under the immediate supervision of parties who managed it for him or had an interest therein. At length the mill-site passed into the ownership of Judge John Perrine, who carried on some manufacturing enterprises there, and soon after 1870 disposed of it to the present proprietors.

The Bloomfield Mill Company was organized in 1872 by R. Atkinson, R. S. Conover, and F. S. Conover, who began the manufacture of liquorice in a factory fitted up for that purpose. Two years later they were succeeded by a stock company under the same name.

The works of the company are contained in a number of substantial buildings, which cover about four acres of ground. Fifty men are employed, and the motive-power of the machinery in use is furnished by an engine of two hundred horse-power and a water-power of half that capacity.

The raw material used consists principally of liquorice-root, which is imported from Spain and Asia Minor, and about five million pounds are consumed annually. About one million pounds of other materials are used in the composition of flavors for the use of tobacco-manufacturers. About one million pounds of mass liquorice is made annually, which is used chiefly in the manufacture of plug tobacco. A portion of the root is crushed, ground, and pressed for use in the preparation of smoking and chewing tobaccos.

THE DILL SNUFF-MILL.—On Deep Run, near its mouth, and near the Mount Pleasant and Old Bridge turnpike, is located the Dill Snuff-Mill. It was erected by John Dill about 1830. In 1870, Mr. Dill was succeeded by his son, William R. Dill. In 1878 the establishment became the property of Richard Brown, of New York, and since that time has been idle.

OTHER MANUFACTURES.—Gen. James Morgan erected the Morgan Pottery near the head of navigation on Cheesquake Creek, not far from the site of his father's former pottery, in 1785, and was an extensive manufacturer of potter's wares there until 1810, when he leased it to Josiah Letts, who operated it until 1815. From 1815 to 1825 it was managed by different parties under a lease from the proprietor. Since that date it has been idle, and the building has gone to decay.

About 1840, Noah Furman started a pottery in the same neighborhood, and was operating it from that date to 1856, when it was destroyed by fire. Peter Jernee's grist-mill on Tenant's Creek has been built a good many years. Clarkson Brown was an early proprietor.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

HON. HENDRICK H. BROWN.

The grandfather of Judge Brown was Whitehead Brown, who resided in what is now Madison township, where he was owner of an extensive tract of productive land and followed farming employments. He was married to Miss Elizabeth Warne and had one son, Abram W. Brown, who spent his youth under the paternal roof, and married Miss Maria, daughter of Ebenezer Price. Their children were George W., Hannah (Mrs. Johnson), Elizabeth (Mrs. Vanderveer), Ebenezer, Lorinda (Mrs. Croft), White, head, Hendrick H., Parker, who died in childhood, Maria, (Mrs. Bisset), and Sarah (Mrs. Reid). Mr. Brown engaged in agricultural employments during his lifetime, but also manifested much interest in public affairs. He was an active Democrat, and held the offices of justice of the peace and freeholder. He was elected sheriff of the county in 1836, and in 1843-44 represented his constituency in the State Senate. He was honored by Governor Haines as a member of the Privy Council during his administration. He was an influential citizen, and remarkable for soundness of judgment, which rendered his services much in demand in the settlement of estates.

He was a regular worshiper at the Baptist Church of Jacksonville, and one of its board of trustees. Mr. Brown's death occurred in 1857, in his fifty-eighth year.

His son, Hendrick H., was born June 23, 1833, on the homestead farm, where the years of his childhood were spent. He first attended the public school of the district, and later repaired to Matawan, Monmouth Co., where his studies were continued.

Having decided upon the life of a farmer, he cultivated the paternal acres until the death of his father, when he purchased the property. He was married May 15, 1861, to Miss Sarah A., daughter of David Crowell, of Perth Amboy. They have children,—Amelia C., George M. (deceased), Howard H., Gracie, (deceased), and Josephine A.

In politics Judge Brown is a pronounced Democrat, and has been actively engaged in public life for many years. He has officiated as surveyor of highways of the township, was a member of the township committee, has been for three years freeholder, and was later appointed one of the lay judges of the Court of Common Pleas, which office he held for a period of ten years. He manifests a deep interest in the cause of education, and has been foremost in promoting its advance in the township of Madison.

His family are among the supporters and regular worshippers of the Presbyterian Church at Matawan, of which Mrs. Brown is a member.

The judge is actively engaged in Sabbath-school work in the immediate vicinity of his home, and contributes in many ways to the growth of the community in morality.

CHAPTER CIII.

Situation and Boundaries.—South Amboy is situated on the eastern border of Middlesex County, and is separated from Staten Island and Perth Amboy by Raritan Bay, which forms its northern and north-eastern boundary. Southeast, south, and west the township is bounded by Sayreville.

Descriptive.—This is one of the oldest, and was formerly one of the largest townships in the county. By successive reductions of its area in the formation of other municipalities it is now the smallest of all, occupying only a little spot on a map of its former territory. Yet the small portion that remains is by far the most important commercially, and by virtue of its admirable location enterprise first took root there, and extended its civilizing and improving influences far inland in every direction, the South Amboy of to-day being not simply the parent, but the feeder as well of all its once extensive area, and at the same time a point of much importance to a large sweep of country beyond.

The surface of the township is rolling and uneven, sloping gradually towards the bay. The soil is sterile and unproductive, but beds of valuable sand and clay abound and extend in all directions inland, which have from early in the history of the locality been important factors in the commerce and manufactures of South Amboy, and of which it is the purpose of the writer to speak at greater length hereafter. The two principal highways in the township are the Bordentown turnpike and the South Amboy and Washington road, which begin at two points in the central and western portions respectively, long known as the Upper and Lower Landings, crossing the township in a southerly course, and afford a means of communication with the interior. The most noticeable thoroughfare traversing any portion of South Amboy east and west is a road known as Broadway, beginning at the western border of the township, forming the principal street of South Amboy village, and intersecting with Main Street not far from the northern terminus of the latter.

The Camden and Amboy branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New York and Long Branch Railroad afford excellent facilities for travel and transportation, the former, which caused the growth of the village and gave the place its present importance, supplying employment, on its trains, its tracks, and its coal-docks, and in its shops, offices, and immense freighting industry, to a good share of the population of the village and township.

In 1880 the real estate of South Amboy was estimated at $609,300. The personal property amounted to $81,400. The total amount of taxable property was $690,700. The amount of funded debt, composed of bonds and interest at six per cent. due in 1882, was $2137.16. The amount of floating debt was $3120.28, due the county collector. The rates of taxation for specified local purposes were as follows: Poor, 24 cents per $100; ways and means and interest on bonds, 18 cents; roads, 8 cents. For state purposes the rate was 20 cents.

in 1820, 3406; in 1830, 3782; in 1840, 1825; in 1850, 2268; in 1870, 4526; in 1880, 3648. The fluctuations which have not been due to gradual growth are explained by the formation from the former territory of South Amboy of townships and parts of townships. At this date most of the population consists of laboring men and their families, and much of it is transient in consequence of the number of boatmen tarrying for a longer or shorter time within the township limits, but not becoming permanent residents.

The range of hills overlooking South Amboy village offer some finely located sites for residences. The scenery is magnificent, with Raritan Bay lying at the beholder's feet, the southeastern shore of Staten Island skirting the horizon to the left, Sandy Hook visible to the right, reaching out into the bay like a long finger pointing the way up the Narrows to New York, and Coney Island just discernible in front across the blue waters of Lower Bay, which forms the foreground of the picture, and in fair weather is speckled far and near with white sails, sometimes momentarily obscured by the smoke of passing steamers, while the sloping promontory upon which the cottages and churches of Perth Amboy have found lodgment rises up at the extreme left, covered in the summer with verdure and plentifully dotted with umbrageous trees, all mingling in a land and water view scarcely equaled elsewhere.

Settlement.—In 1683 the proprietors made strenuous exertions to open a road from Perth Amboy to Burlington, to draw off the travel that was then taking the road from near Elizabethtown Point to the Delaware via New Brunswick, and in 1684 Deputy Governor Laurie succeeded in opening the road which is still used, connecting it by a ferry-boat at South Amboy. Notwithstanding aid was sought from the Assembly to compel people to travel by this route, the old Dutch road was long the more popular. It would not require any stretch of the imagination to presume that the establishment of this ferry was the first step taken at South Amboy in the gradual progress to the present. The pioneers within the present township limits were few in number, but there were some of them full of enterprise, and it was the ferry and inland travel that they seized upon for a means of livelihood and profit, for the soil was too poor to tempt the agriculturist, and it must have been early evident that if South Amboy was to be a place of importance it was in consequence of its location rather than of any promise which it gave of ever being the centre of a farming country. It might some day be a prominent shipping-point, and the locality of the transfer of the freights of a great extent of territory, embracing numerous large cities and populous towns, but it would never have that steady and substantial growth which makes a town to which a rich and fertile agricultural section is tributary. Nature did little to render the soil attractive either to the tiller or the resident, much of the area now covered by South

Amboy village having been a marshy jungle of stunted pines.

One of the first settlers in South Amboy was Lazarus Wilmurt, who located very early on the property now owned wholly or in part by Mr. R. S. Conover, where he resided a number of years. His children were Daniel, Joshua, Elizabeth, and Sally.

Daniel Wilmurt married and had quite a family of children, named Jacob, Lewis, Thomas, and Sally Ann. Jacob and Lewis died young. Thomas married a Miss Applegate and had one child. The daughter married Andrew K. Morehouse, of New York.

Of Daniel Wilmurt, who was well known early in the present century as a hotel-keeper and the proprietor of lines of boats and stages, further mention will be found farther on, his enterprises having ranked with the foremost of that time.

Joshua Wilmurt married and located in Brooklyn, and does not seem to have borne any part in historical events in South Amboy. Elizabeth married Capt. William Rose, a somewhat well-known early waterman at South Amboy, and had children named Garret, Catharine, Phoebe, Sally, Maria, Hannah, and Ann. Sally, daughter of Lazarus Wilmurt, married Peter Johnson, and early located near her father's place. Her sons were, some of them, James, Peter, and Wilmurt Johnson.

The land of Wilmurt extended beyond the present limits of South Amboy into Sayreville, but for reasons which must be obvious to any one at all familiar with the history of that part of old South Amboy bordering the bay, all of which, in common with the South Amboy of to-day, has ever been and is devoted to the same interests which have made the present township what it is, it is deemed best to treat that part of the township as formerly bounded without reference to the boundary lines of the present. On the Kearney tract, west of the village, located a pioneer named Rose, whose descendants intermarried to some extent with the Wilmurts. His son, Timothy Rose, resided there from about 1804 to 1811, and about the latter date purchased land on the Bordentown turnpike. His family consisted of sons named Elias, Ephraim, John, and William, and two daughters. Ephraim married and remained on the homestead a number of years, until the death of his wife. He was a second time married, and soon after removed to Jacksonville, in Madison, where he lived until his death. By his first wife he had sons named Elias, John, and William, and two daughters. The former took the old homestead on the Bordentown road after his father's removal, and yet lives upon it. William lives near Jacksonville. Elias, brother of Ephraim, married a Miss Brown and located near his father. His sons, John and William, died young.

The Disbrow family, of which John Disbrow was the earliest remembered representative, at the beginning of the present century, and perhaps earlier, owned a considerable tract of land embracing the eastern part of the village of South Amboy, and extending down to the bay. John Disbrow, whose mother is said to have been a sister of William Burnet, of Allentown, N. J., sold this tract to Samuel Gordon, Sr., in 1808, and removed to Roundabout, now in Sayreville township. This property is historically of much local interest, and will be seen to figure prominently in the subsequent history of South Amboy.

Early in this century there were residing along the bay-shore, within and adjacent to the present borders of South Amboy, several families, among them the Morgans (from whom were descended Gen. James Morgan and his grandsons, Dr. L. O. Morgan and Charles Morgan, counselor-at-law, the two latter residents of South Amboy village at this time), some of the Wilmurts and Roses previously mentioned; Phineas Rolfe, father of Hon. Isaac Rolfe, of New Brunswick, then a waterman and later a boat captain; Jacob Brookfield, Joseph Bloodgood, and Matthias Johnson, and also the Hansel, Kearney, and Hanks families. In 1806 there were only three habitations within view from the central part of the present village of South Amboy. These were the farm-houses of John Disbrow and Joshua Wilmurt and an ancient public-house, later known as the "Railroad House."

THE OLD RATTOONE HOUSE.—By the above name was the old hostelry just referred to known at the time under consideration. Its beginning is shrouded in the past, and uncertain tradition discloses no date at which it was probably built. It was located at the end of the old Bordentown road, extending in an east-and-west direction nearly parallel with the bay-shore. The main part was three stories high and about sixty feet by forty. At the east side was a wing long and low, being only a story and a half high and about fifty feet by twenty-five, and at the west side was a wing about forty feet by thirty, and two stories high. The latter was known early as "the Princeton end," probably because it was in the direction of Princeton, then one of the few places of importance near Amboy inland. The latter wing is thought to have been the original portion of the rambling structure, and for many years perhaps all of it that existed.

There is a tradition of "the Princeton end" of this old house which, while it is too improbable to throw any light upon prehistoric events there, may at least prove interesting as illustrating the conjectural range of the human mind. Seventy-five years ago it was sometimes said, but with no tangible authority, that before the days of stages drawn by horses and before the beginning of any considerable shipping traffic between New York and Philadelphia by way of the bay and the Delaware River and the intervening country, merchandise was carried overland from South Amboy to the Delaware by means of heavy wagons drawn by cattle, and that there was a passenger line with the same motive-power, which, if it ever really existed, could scarcely have been regarded as a means of rapid transit, "the Princeton end" of the old hotel and a dilapidated dock, which was then located at the salt meadows half a mile above, playing their part in the accommodation of passengers en route and the transfer of goods to and from vessels.

The hotel entire as it has been described was certainly standing there during the Revolutionary war, when it was kept by John Rattoone, of Perth Amboy, who was a justice of the peace in 1791 and 1792, and was familiarly referred to in 1800 and later as "Squire" Rattoone, and it remained there until destroyed by fire only a few years since, a link connecting the locality in the unknown past with the South Amboy of the last decade. During the Revolution it is said to have been much frequented by British, and to some extent by American, officers. It is related of Rattoone that he was a man of infinite tact, and was able to entertain British and American officers in the house at the same time, locating them in the opposite ends without allowing either to know of the presence of the other, and was "hail fellow well met" with all. If this is true he must have possessed diplomatic talent of a high order, which he could doubtless have employed more profitably during those troublous times. After the Revolution the hotel and much land, embracing the western part of the village and township as now bounded, passed into the possession of Daniel Wilmurt, who was "mine host" at the old stand up to April 1, 1806, when he sold the property described, measuring, with a water-front nearly a mile long, about three hundred and forty acres, to Gen. Obediah Herbert and his brother John. Immediately thereafter Samuel Gordon, Sr., purchased a half-interest of the Herberts in this property, and became the landlord at the ancient hostelry.

THE FIRST ERA OF BUSINESS ACTIVITY.—The advent of Samuel Gordon, Sr., in South Amboy marked the beginning of a new era, an era of progress and sharp business competition, which resulted in much substantial good to the locality. He came from Bordentown, where he had been a tavern-keeper and stage proprietor, and was a man of enterprise and ability, daring in his conceptions and far-seeing in his plans, and bold in their execution, resolute, pushing, and untiring, not given to hesitating at obstacles.

Daniel Wilmurt was a man of similar mental characteristics. Gordon and Wilmurt became enemies and rivals in business, and the sharp competition between these two men, each determined to outdo the other in enterprise and gain the greater popularity with the public, was a means of advancement to South Amboy and the whole country between there and the Delaware. Previous to 1830, or thereabout, stage-lines carried passengers between Bordentown and South Amboy, and they were conveyed by sloops between New York and South Amboy, and Bordentown and Philadelphia.

No sooner had Gordon taken possession of the old hotel in 1806, becoming half-owner of the stand and the adjacent property, than he established a line of sloops between New York and South Amboy, and put a line of stages on the road between South Amboy and Bordentown, beginning what soon proved to be a profitable business, observing which, Wilmurt, in 1807, probably with the thought of sharing in the enterprise, purchased of Obediah and John Herbert the other half-interest in the property, thus becoming an equal sharer with Gordon in its ownership. For a few months the two attempted to manage the hotel as partners, but each was too much set in his own way and too tenacious of his own rights to agree with the other, and it soon became apparent to both that an early separation and the withdrawal of one or the other from the stand was inevitable. But each wished to stay and neither wished to go. The business was too profitable and was growing too fast for either to consent to relinquish his share of it without a struggle. It is not improbable that Wilmurt thought to take the carrying trade from Gordon if he could obtain entire possession of the hotel, land, and dock, and that it was the dislike to yield to another the business he had built up that led Gordon to strenuously refuse to sell his share of the property, for presently there came a time when each clamored for the privilege of buying out the other, and both refused to sell. This state of things could not long continue, and they at last decided mutually to leave the adjustment of their difficulty to three referees, one of whom was to be chosen by Gordon, one by Wilmurt, and one by the two so chosen.

Robert Montgomery and Joseph Marsh, of Allentown, N. J., and George Compton, of Perth Amboy, were selected and consented to act as referees in the matter in dispute, and they decided that Gordon should leave the property in the possession of Wilmurt, and that the latter should pay Gordon the cost price of everything he had bought to furnish the hotel with, or stock its larder and its wine-cellar, reimburse him in the sum of ten thousand dollars for the purchase-money he had paid for his half-interest in the property, and pay him a bonus of one thousand dollars for the trouble and inconvenience attendant upon the relinquishment of his share of the land, house, dock, and hotel business. To this decree Gordon assented, and left the premises as soon as he conveniently could, refusing a liberal offer from Wilmurt for his sloops, stages, horses, and other property employed in the transportation of passengers between New York and Bordentown.

If Wilmurt had calculated upon being left in undisputed possession of the carrying trade at South Amboy by this purchase of Gordon's interest in the old hotel and dock, he had done so without an adequate knowledge of Gordon's character and resources. No sooner did the latter become aware that he must relinquish the hotel and water-privileges to Wilmurt than he purchased the John Disbrow farm, on the bay-shore in the eastern portion of the present village, previously referred to, and began at once to enlarge and remodel the old farm-house for use as a hotel, running his packets to a point opposite there, and taking passengers from his stages to his boats and from his boats to his stages by means of row-boats until he could construct a landing-place and dock.

A few years later the Bordentown turnpike was chartered and constructed, and Gordon, who was a stockholder, secured its terminus in South Amboy at his hotel, a measure which proved very favorable to his business, and a year or two afterwards Wilmurt obtained a charter for a branch of the Bordentown turnpike to his hotel and dock. The competition thus early begun between these two men was continued, it is said somewhat acrimoniously, for years. Each exerted himself to the utmost to gain favor with the public, and to shorten the time consumed in a passage between New York and Philadelphia. It is related that one of them boastingly prophesied that he would cut the time down to a day and a half between the two cities. This then unattained so-called quick time seems long when compared with the present transit from Jersey City to Philadelphia in an hour and fifty minutes, much of the way over nearly the same route. Both stage proprietors had extra relays of horses, and in speaking of this period it is common for old residents of South Amboy to remark that "things were kept hot between Amboy and Bordentown." Each line ran two or three stages each way every day between South Amboy and Bordentown in the summer, and between South Amboy and Camden in the winter, when the ice prevented the navigation of the Delaware. The late John Seward and William P. Wisner, who is eighty-three years of age and still a resident of South Amboy, were drivers over this route, and Samuel Gordon, Jr., son of Samuel Gordon, Sr., now living in Washington, in East Brunswick, at an advanced age, was also identified with the business.

The passengers in transit both ways invariably stopped in South Amboy overnight, the stages from Bordentown and Camden and the sloops from New York both arriving there late in the day or at night, and starting on their return trips in the morning. This rendered hotel-keeping very profitable, and the travelers often made the two hotels there the scenes of jollifications which they doubtless, some of them, remember to the present time. It is claimed by those who had an opportunity to know that good liquor was sold in South Amboy in those days, and much of it was drank there. The bar in the old Rattoone House during this time was partitioned off from the bar-room proper, and communication with the bar-tender was had only through a large wicket or window-hole, which was part of the time closed, and opened only at the will of that functionary. It is stated that business was conducted on the most democratic plan imaginable, patrons of high and low degree all faring alike, each receiving through the aperture an honest gill of such kind of "liquid cheer" as he called for, no more, no less. Whether that amount made a drink larger or smaller than the customer desired was a question about which the bartender did not trouble his brain. Often both houses were jammed almost to suffocation, and it is said travelers frequently found themselves in the company of strange bedfellows, and submitted to inconvenience with commendable grace and resignation, the landlords possessing the tact to very often happily turn into a joke, by an opportune pleasantry, affairs that otherwise would have become so serious as to demand recourse to pugilistic displays, with a fair field and no favors asked. The business was exacting, and from its very nature trying, to both Gordon and Wilmurt, but they made it profitable, and kept up their rivalry till the latter's death, about 1824, Gordon's hotel burning down in 1814, and being immediately rebuilt.

From 1823 to 1825, Gordon was at Washington, engaged in the construction of the Washington Canal, from South River to the Raritan, and during that time he leased or otherwise disposed of the hotel at the new dock, later keeping it from 1828 to 1834. It was afterwards kept by George Parisen and others, then converted to other purposes, and burned about 1846. After the death of Daniel Wilmurt his widow kept the Rattoone House about a year, and in 1825 was succeeded by Samuel Gordon, Sr., who was again, after a lapse of seventeen years, in possession of the house he had resigned to Wilmurt in 1808, and continued in charge until 1828. Saxon M. Tice was his successor, giving place, two or three years later, to mine host Brookfield, who, like Tice, is remembered by many who were once patrons of the house. In 1846, Samuel Gordon, Jr., became landlord, remaining till 1849. Subsequently to the completion of the Camden and Amboy Railroad the hotel became known as the Railroad House. After Gordon left it had several other landlords in succession, the last being Willett Martin, who was doing the honors of the establishment at the time of its destruction.

The Camden and Amboy Railroad did away with any necessity for stage-travel between the two points named, and the packets which had been so long and so profitably run between South Amboy and New York were forced to give way to the more rapid steam navigation introduced by Cornelius Vanderbilt and others.

The Village of South Amboy.—The Camden and Amboy Railroad was chartered Feb. 4, 1830; $1,000,000 stock was subscribed by April 12th; work was commenced by June or July, and Sept. 19, 1832, the track from Bordentown to Hightstown was first used with horse-cars, and December 17th following passengers were conveyed from Bordentown to South Amboy. The first car of freight over the road was drawn by horses driven by Mr. Benjamin Fish, leaving Amboy Jan. 24, 1833. It was not until September of the same year that trains were drawn by a locomotive, which had that year been built in England for use on this road. It was on exhibition at the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia in 1876, and is still in the shop of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company at Bordentown. It has always been known as the "Johnny Bull" on account of its English manufacture. There are yet living at South Amboy several persons who saw it set out on its first trip over the road, and relate that the day on which it did so was long remembered as a red-letter day in the memory of the inhabitants. The passenger-cars composing the train were like the old-fashioned round-bodied coaches, with doors at the sides, and were intended to seat six persons each.

Such in brief is the early history of the Camden and Amboy Railroad. It introduced a new element at South Amboy and changed the occupation and aspirations of the few people there, building up new industries on the ruins of those it destroyed, and causing the then sparse settlement to grow to a flourishing village of nearly 4000 souls. But this development was far from being as rapid as it has been in other places under like circumstances.

LAND PURCHASES AND SPECULATIONS.—The Camden and Amboy Railroad Company purchased the land upon which their depot, offices, tracks, shops, docks, and other property are located, and several hundred acres, including the western part of the village, of William Gibbons, who had bought it of the representatives of the estate of Daniel Wilmurt, deceased, in 1827, and built houses upon it for the use of some of their employes, the first so erected having been the brick ones on Main Street below Broadway; but aside from these, few dwellings were built anywhere in the village for some years. Retaining control of the hotel and dock on the Disbrow farm, in 1816, Samuel Gordon, Sr., sold a half-interest in the land to Lewis Abrahams. From the latter it passed to Daniel Wilmurt in 1822, and until the death of Wilmurt, soon after, he and Gordon were again partners in the ownership of real estate. In 1824, Wilmurt's interest passed by inheritance into the possession of his daughter, Mrs. Andrew K. Morehouse, who sold it to Henry and David Cotheal in 1832. About 1830, Gordon sold the remaining half-interest, and the title to it presently became vested in George C. Thomas, from whom Gordon bought a one-fourth interest in 1832, and dying in 1834, bequeathed it to his son, Samuel Gordon, Jr.

This tract embraced much of the eastern portion of the village. In 1833 it was surveyed into lots by a civil engineer of Brooklyn, N. Y., named Graves. These lots were of the usual size of village lots, and were 2900 in number. They were offered at reasonable prices, but found no purchasers. In 1834, Samuel Gordon, Jr., sold one-half of his one fourth interest in the property to Messrs. Graves and Butler, of Brooklyn. It was then owned as follows: One-fourth each by Henry Cotheal, David Cotheal, and George C. Thomas, and one-eighth each by Samuel Gordon, Jr., and Graves and Butler conjointly. Some years later the whole tract was sold at auction in New York to various parties for $22,300. None of the purchasers ever located on their lots, and few of them ever saw them. No important improvements were made in the village during the following few years other than those which were gradually appearing on the railroad company's lands in the western part. In 1834, Gordon, in his "Gazetteer," stated that the village contained "a hotel and some fifteen or twenty dwellings, and an extensive manufactory of stoneware." The latter was in the eastern part of the present village, and its history is given elsewhere.

About 1848, Samuel Gordon, Jr., bought two hundred and forty of the lots above referred to at one dollar each of Messrs. Pine & Van Antwerp, of New York, who had purchased them at the auction sale, and been unable to dispose of them since then. Meeting Abraham Everett the next day, he informed him of the transaction, and asked him to become a partner in the speculation, to which he consented, later buying and selling several hundred lots on his individual account. A short time afterwards Samuel Gordon, Jr., and George H. Weston bargained with David Hill, a speculator of New York, for one hundred and forty lots at one dollar each. Hill was not by any means a substantial man, and his business was so precarious that it is said he seldom occupied the same office more than a few days, and when Weston went to New York to pay him for the lots and receive the titles to the same, he was unable to find him. Returning to South Amboy, he was advised by Gordon to write a letter to Hill asking the latter to appoint an interview at which money and titles could be exchanged. Hill responded, meeting Gordon and Weston at some convenient place in the lower part of the city. In the course of the conversation which ensued, Hill said something which indicated that he was greatly in need of money, and did not regard the lots as of any particular value, from which Weston surmised that a better bargain might have been made with him, a supposition which he, Yankee-like, resolved to put to a practical test. Presently he informed Hill that it would be inconvenient for him to pay him the cash that day, and hinted that an arrangement of a different kind would be desirable to him. Hill insisted on having the money, and finally offered to deduct twenty-five dollars from the total price of the lots (one hundred and forty dollars) if he could have the money then. Weston intimated that he hoped to be able to raise the required amount among his friends in the city, and went out. After a while he returned, and paid Hill one hundred and fifteen dollars for the one hundred and forty lots, effecting a saving of twenty-five dollars on the transaction. Samuel Gordon, Jr., who related this incident to the writer, states that he and Weston soon sold a majority of these lots at ten to twenty dollars each, and some of the choicest of them at fifty to seventy dollars each, clearing a nice little sum by the speculation. This circumstance has been given place in these pages to show how cheaply lands were regarded in South Amboy less than thirty-five years ago. Hill, like other New York owners of these lots, had no idea that they were becoming valuable, and during the few years following many of the lots which had been almost literally "sent to New York to market" were eagerly bought back by residents of South Amboy, and by them sold at a good profit to men who bought them at only fair prices and reared up homes upon them one after another until what was at a comparatively recent date a barren waste grew to be a thrifty village. Among those not already mentioned who bought and sold village-lots in South Amboy were Charles Fish, freight agent for many years for the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company; Ward C. Perrine, merchant and clay operator; and Philip J. Parisen, formerly also a dealer in merchandise and clay, but now dead. The dwellings belonging to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company gradually increased in numbers, and the space between the "railroad tract" and the "Gordon tract" in time became thickly settled, uniting the once isolated eastern and western portions of the village.

BUILDING LOANS.—Building loans have assisted very materially in building up the village. The first loan was organized in 1853, and through its means a good many houses were erected. Loan No. 2 was organized in 1865, and proved very successful, running out in less than eleven years, and greatly facilitating the growth of the place. The continued demand for dwellings led to the organization, in 1868, of Loan No. 3, with thirteen hundred shares. Within three years, as the result of this movement, new dwellings were erected in all parts of the village, and there was a considerable increase in population. In 1881 its affairs were wound up, and an extra dividend of three dollars and sixty-nine cents was returned to each stockholder. In 1873, Enterprise Building Loan was organized, and twenty-two hundred shares were issued. It was successful for a short time, until the panic caused a sudden cessation of all active business. Among the prominent projectors of and workers for the success of these loans were Abraham Everett, Edward O. Howell, Albert Roll, R. H. Guild, and Bernard Roddy.

RAILROADS.—The liberal policy of the early promoters of the Camden and Amboy Railroad, Messrs. John C. and R. C. Stevens, then of New York, and Edwin Stevens, of Hoboken, aided the growth of the village to a great extent, and they and members of their families were foremost with labor and means in establishing schools and churches,—a task in which they were aided and succeeded by the Conover family, now represented at South Amboy by Mr. R. S. Conover. Due mention of the benefactions of these families will be seen in the histories of the educational and religious interests of the township. Mr. John C. Stevens and others of his family became permanent residents. Messrs. Abraham Everett, Charles Fish, Aaron H. Van Cleve, William G. Wisner, John Sexton, and other employés of the company, were men of enterprise and sound judgment, and became identified with the leading interests of the place, making a record as good and progressive citizens.

The old depot, the first in the village, was built in 1833: the present one about 1848. The first general agent of the company at South Amboy was Jacob Campbell. His successors have been Abraham Everett, Aaron H. Van Cleve, Charles Saylor, Samuel Wright, and Alexander Southerland, now in service. Charles Fish was freight agent from the beginning of the company's business until his death, a few years since. The present freight agent is Mr. J. V. P. Bissett. William G. Wisner has been constantly on the pay-roll of the company as an employé in the freight department, much of the time as superintendent, since 1831. The various departments of the company's local business are under the superintendence of Thomas Kerr, master-mechanic, with eighty men; Peter S. Bogert, foreman of car repairs, with fifty-two men; Joseph Wilson, foreman of the ship-yard, with ninety men; Josiah D. Stults, road foreman, with twelve men; Frederick I. Stults, foreman of road repairs, with ten men; John Sexton, foreman of the round-house, with ten men; and D. W. Cozzens, superintendent of maintenance of way, with forty-five men.

The increasing railroad business attracted many workmen to the place, and the war of the Rebellion gave an impetus to the growth of South Amboy by the increased freight business of the railroad company. A great number of soldiers and immense stores of munitions of war were shipped over the road, giving employment to a large force of men at this end of the route. Several large steamboats and barges were employed to transport freight to and from South Amboy. Many houses were built during this time, and the village assumed considerable importance. After the war ended the place continued to grow, but in January, 1872, the railroad was leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which soon after began to construct car-floats to transport loaded freight-cars across the Hudson River between New York and Jersey City. This change was the cause of the town's losing one of its most honored citizens in the person of the late A. H. Van Cleve, then agent of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company at South Amboy, as well as nearly all of the vast freight business of the road. Many of our old citizens were thrown out of employment, as they were not able to do the work required on the coal-docks, which industry had been growing in importance for several years. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company continued to increase the shipment of coal and to build wharves for that purpose, until to-day South Amboy is one of the most important coal ports in the country. The coal docks and railroad-shops give the greater part of the employment to be had in the place.

In July, 1875, the New York and Long Branch Railroad was opened to the public, with a station centrally located in South Amboy, from which New York may be reached in an hour's time. There are living in the village persons who remember when there was no other means of reaching the metropolis from that point than the slow and uncomfortable sloop, which often consumed from two to three days in making the trip. The local agent of this railway is Mr. C. H. Southwick.

MERCHANTS AND DEALERS.—The first store within the present limits of South Amboy was opened about 1808 by Samuel Gordon, Sr., near his hotel and dock. At a later period Oliver Johnson was a partner in the enterprise. Samuel Gordon, Jr., then a mere boy, was an assistant there, and tells many interesting anecdotes of trade there at that date. Many customers came from a distance. It would probably be hard to conceive of a more heterogeneous stock of merchandise than was crowded into that little store, for the proprietors were alive to the demands of the people and the times, and made it a point to keep about everything any patron could possibly desire to buy. The nearness of this store to New York and Gordon's facilities for quick and cheap transportation of goods gave him an advantage over neighboring merchants in the way of low prices that, judging from the characteristics manifested in his other transactions, he was doubtless quick to avail himself of. This enterprise was abandoned after a time, and up to 1831 the town depended upon Perth Amboy for supplies, which, in cold and stormy weather or when the water was rough, were not brought over without much trouble.

John Perrine, father of Orlando and H. C. Perrine, now a resident at Bloomfield Mills, near Spottswood, and known as ex-Judge Perrine, in 1831 opened the first store in what we may perhaps be permitted to call the modern South Amboy, in distinction from the South Amboy of an earlier date, from which fact he is generally accredited with having been the pioneer merchant in the village. The building in which it was kept was long known as "the railroad store," and was the lower building on the east side of Main Street, formerly the Wilmurt branch of the Borden-town turnpike. This structure was burned a few years ago. James Buckelew and Capt. Shippen, paymaster for the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, were also early identified with the management of "the railroad store." Thomas and John Applegate traded there a while, and, after them, Charles Perrine. The latter was succeeded by James Breese and Charles S. Clark. Clark succeeded Breese about 1848, and traded there until a little after the beginning of the late war. This store was afterwards kept by Richard S. Conover, with Capt. P. V. De Graw in charge, until about the close of the war. John Mount was the next merchant there. He was succeeded by John Cozzens, who was the last. Ward C. Perrine came to South Amboy from Hightstown in 1852, and opened a store on Augusta Street, near Broadway, which was destroyed by fire in February, 1860. Mr. Perrine occupied a building on Broadway belonging to Abraham Everett until the following August, when he removed into his store, then just completed, at the corner of Broadway and Augusta Street. In March, 1881, he was succeeded there by J. E. Montgomery, who, in September of the same year, sold out to William G. Howell.

Philip J. Parisen, a portion of the time in partnership with George W. Warner, had a store on Broadway, between Augusta and David Streets, from 1853 to 1857, when he was succeeded by Orlando Perrine. His son, A. C. Parisen, is a druggist on Broadway. C. C. Parisen is a dealer in coal and wood.

Orlando Perrine came to South Amboy in 1857, and began business in the Parisen store. In 1862 he left the place, returning in 1871 to open a store at the Hillmann stand on Broadway. In December, 1878, he removed to the store he lately occupied at the corner of Broadway and First Street, and in February, 1882, returned to the Hellmann store with the intention of there remaining.

B. F. Howell began in South Amboy as a merchant in 1866, in a building on the site of his present store, which was removed and replaced by that now in use in 1875. Mr. Howell has an extensive coal-yard, and was formerly engaged in the lumber trade.

John Hillmann, William Thoru & Son, Jacob Goodman, Isaiah Disbrow, and others, whose names cannot now be recalled, have been merchants in the village at different periods for a longer or shorter time. Moses Laird built a store on Broadway some years ago, which he has rented to several persons who have traded there. Meinzer & Stutzel had a store at the corner of Broadway and the Bordentown turnpike, and were succeeded by a son of the former. The merchants and shop-keepers of the present are as follows, their places of business being, unless otherwise designated, on Broadway: E. C. Akin, proprietor of the ship-stores, Wyoming pier; William Birmingham, grocer, Augusta Street; Joseph Christoph, boot and shoe dealer; William C. Cook, grocer, First Street; J. O. Cozzens, grocer; Philip Dangler, clothier; J. L. Disbrow, grocer, David Street; Peter Disbrow, tobacconist and confectioner, Conover Street; L. Dolan, tobacconist; G. Lawrence, boot and shoe dealer, Augusta Street; Joseph Guttman, dry-goods dealer; Mrs. Lizzie Hoffman, dealer in dry-goods and fancy goods; William G. Howell, grocer; B. F. Howell, general merchant; George W. Jaques, druggist; J. Knochel, dealer in boots and shoes; James Levy, dealer in boots and shoes, Augusta Street; Mrs. McAdams, confectioner; Neil Mc-

Gonigle, jeweler; Nathan Marks, clothier; John Martin, furniture-dealer and undertaker; J. E. Montgomery, general merchant; L. O. Morgan, druggist; J. B. Merrill, druggist; Phineas Mundy, dealer in boots and shoes; A. C. Parisen, druggist; Orlando Perrine, general merchant; Alfred S. Rue, tobacconist and confectioner, Conover Street; Bernard Roddy, news-dealer; Frank Schantz, dealer in stoves and tin-ware; Jacob Schmid, jeweler; Mrs. M. E. Sexton, confectioner; William Sexton, furniture and hardware-dealer; Andrew J. Slover, grocer; M. B. Thompson, grocer; Henry Timmins, dealer in stoves and tinware; J. M. Voorhees, green-grocer; Frank Weaver, dealer in boots and shoes; Henry Wolf, general merchant; A. Blodgett, jeweler; and Mrs. Patrick McCormick, grocer, David Street.

Semuel Pimlott, John Disbrow, and William Dixon are bakers, and meat-markets are kept by Christian and Gottlob Straub.

PROFESSIONAL MEN.—The pioneer lawyer at South Amboy was Charles Morgan, still practicing his profession there. Other attorneys are Thomas J. Cloke and James Corkery.

The first resident physician was Dr. L. D. Morse, who came about 1832. The second was Dr. Benedict. Drs. George Hubbard, Charles Marsh, and George W. Stout practiced there at different times. One of the oldest of the present physicians is Dr. Ambrose Treganowan, who came in 1860. For a number of years previous to the lease of the Camden and Amboy Railroad he was a salaried surgeon in the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and has since sustained a similar relation to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Other practitioners of the "old school" are Drs. L. O. Morgan, Leon White, and J. H. Carman. Dr. Thomas T. Howard, Jr., a homeopath, is well known, and has a good practice among the adherents to the principles of his "school."

POSTMASTERS.—The post-office at South Amboy was established about 1844, with Charles Perrine as postmaster. His successors have been Dr. L. D. Morse, George W. Warner, Charles S. Clark, Peter P. Voorhees, Oliver Cox, Albert Roll, Abraham Everett, Henry C. Cadmus, and Mrs. H. C. Cadmus, widow of the last mentioned, who was commissioned in 1881 by President Arthur.

Organization.—An offspring of the once extensive township of Piscataway, and formerly included in that wide sweep of country known in early records as "the South Ward of Perth Amboy," South Amboy was erected as a separate township soon after the organization of Middlesex County in 1685. Originally it was eighteen miles long and six miles wide, and had an area of sixty-four thousand acres. In 1838 Monroe was taken from its territory; in 1869, Madison; and in 1876, Sayreville. It is now the smallest but still one of the most important townships in the county, embracing little more than the village of South Amboy.

An act passed by the Council and General Assembly of New Jersey, Feb. 23, 1838, erecting the township of Monroe out of that part of South Amboy lying west of the Matchaponix and South Rivers, also provided that the inhabitants of that part of the said township of South Amboy that lies east of the Matchaponix and South Rivers "be constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of the Inhabitants of the Township of South Amboy, in the County of Middlesex," appointing the first town-meeting to be held on the second Monday of April, 1838, at the public-house of Clarkson Brown. Although there appears nothing in the records of either township to warrant the statement that South Amboy was reorganized at the time of the erection of Monroe, such would seem to have been the case, judging from the clause in the act referred to. None of the records of South Amboy prior to 1838 are to be found. April 16th that year the township committee ordered four dollars to be expended in the purchase of "town books," and the records now to be seen appear to have been then begun in new books of entry. The minutes of town-meetings, 1864 to 1869, inclusive, appear to have been torn from the books, and the present authorities disclaim any knowledge of them.

Below is as complete a civil list of South Amboy as the records afford data to present. The list of chosen freeholders was obtained from the records of the Middlesex County board of freeholders, and is believed to be complete to date :

Industrial Pursuits.—The railroads and the coal trade supply most of the employment to laborers in South Amboy. Something of the extent of the business of the former may be learned from a perusal of other pages. The coal trade here is very large, and many men are employed about the docks and yards where it is handled. The following are the names of the principal coal agents, merchants, and shippers: Andrew J. Furman, C. C. Parisen, John Scully, B. F. Howell, Thomas Cahill, F. E. DeGraw, George R. Dingee. Formerly many carpenters at South Amboy found employment in building or repairing vessels which plied between there and New York. Elisha Blew was an early contractor and builder, erecting many houses for the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. William Dayton was also a well-known builder. Messrs. Disbrow and Slover and Ambrose Maxfield are builders of a later date. The lumber trade is now represented by Leouard Furman and others.

SAND AND CLAY.—A white clay crops out in South Amboy near the wharf at the end of Borden-town turnpike. It appears about five feet above high-water level. A few rods southwest of this point, and also along the shore, a dark, drab-colored clay crops out in the upland bluff, rising eight feet above tide-level. This appears to lie above the white clay. In Mrs. Clark's pits, near the shore, this clay is seen ten feet above the same level. The clay dug in these pits is very sandy, as is seen in the following analysis of a specimen:

Alumina and titanica acid, 17.58; silicic acid, 19.50; water (combined), 4.50; sand (quartz), 53.20; potash, 2.24; magnesia, 0.42; sesquioxide of iron, 1.42; water (moisture), 1.20.

Its composition is much like that of the stoneware clays of this district. It is used in making yellow-ware. Towards the bottom it is not so sandy, and is said to be too refractory for ware. In some of this drab-colored clay there is much lignite and many leaf impressions. Their outlines are well preserved and clearly marked. There is a close correspondence between this clay and that of Disbrow's bank at Old Bridge, both in position and chemical composition. The place of these clays is doubtful. They are certainly below the horizon of most of the stoneware clays, and they are too high for the South Amboy fire-clay bed, unless there is a change in the rate of dip of the latter, and that is here higher than it would otherwise be. The whiter portions resemble the fire-clays in external appearance. The leaf layer over this would also correspond with that seen over the fire-clay in the bank on the Brick estate. If it be a part of that bed, the drab-colored clay at the top and that dug for ware are hardly parts of the same stratum. Deeper diggings may discover the more refractory clay of the South Amboy bed.

The fire-sand of Maxfield & Parisen is dug at the side of the New York and Long Branch Railroad. It is on the east side of the road, and about a quarter of a mile southeast of the station. There is at least thirty feet thickness of this bed. At the top there is a thin layer of loam. It shows fine lines of stratification, which descend at an angle of ten degrees towards the southeast. Along some of these lines there is a little yellowish earth. These alternate irregularly with the sand. The sand is very firm and solid in the bank, requiring the use of a pick to cut it down, and the bank stands up nearly vertical. The digging goes down to tide-level, and the sand is loaded on boats off the shore.

Everett & Perrine's clay pits are in South Amboy, near the Jacksonville road. The ground is ninety to one hundred feet high, and rises rapidly on all sides excepting towards the east. The top of the clay opened in the several pits is eighty-two, eighty-four, eighty-five, and eighty-eight feet high. In some dug quite recently there is one to six feet of yellow sand and gravel at the top; then one foot or about that of black, sandy earth, quite full of wood; then four to ten feet of clay, light-colored and rather sandy, becoming more sandy and of a darker color towards the bottom. Also pyrite occurs towards the bottom. It is underlaid by sand. This clay is dug for the supply of the pottery in South Amboy belonging to the Fish estate. It is used in making yellow-ware.

Southeast of the above openings clay was formerly dug at several points by Mr. Parisen. Sandy clay of a dark color and containing lignite and pyrite appears in the old bank, but as no work has been done here in some years the lower strata have not been seen.

East of the Parisen bank there is another opening in the side-hill worked by Messrs. Everett & Perrine. The clay is covered by five feet of sand and gravel. At the top it is slightly stained on seams by oxide of iron. The main body is drab-colored, drying bluish white, and is very sandy. It is only a few feet thick, and is underlaid by sand. It is inferior to the clay of the western pits. It goes to the pottery on the bay-shore half a mile east of this opening.

Samuel Gordon, who began to dig clay in small quantities on his property at South Amboy as early as 1807, continuing until his death in 1834, was undoubtedly the pioneer in the sand and clay industry, as he was in other enterprises in the township and elsewhere.

POTTERIES.—A pottery which came to be known as Congress Hill Pottery was early established at the foot of the Bordentown turnpike, on the beach and near the old dock known as Gordon's dock, by William Hancock, an Englishman by birth, who manufactured a superior quality of chinaware. Hancock was soon succeeded by George Price and others, who carried on the manufacture of stoneware for several years, when the pottery was abandoned and stood idle until 1849, when it was purchased by Abraham Cadmus, who made Rockingham and yellow-ware until his death, about 1854. The pottery remained inactive until 1857, when it was bought by Joseph Wooton, who operated it until 1860, when he was succeeded by William A. Allen. In 1861 the establishment was destroyed by fire. This factory is well remembered by the older residents. It was a wood structure resting on a brick foundation.

The Swan Hill Pottery, on Raritan Bay shore, was established in 1849 by Sparks & Moore, who manufactured Rockingham and yellow-ware about a year, and in 1850 were succeeded in the business by Fish & Hanks, who, in the fall of that year, abandoned the enterprise. The pottery was idle until 1852. At that time the works were again put in operation by James Carr, Thomas Locker, Daniel Greatbach, and Enoch Moore, under the firm-name of James Carr & Co. Not long afterwards Messrs. Greatbach and Moore withdrew from the firm, and were succeeded by Joseph Wooton and Samuel Riley. In 1854 the pottery was destroyed by fire. It was soon rebuilt by James Fish and James Carr, who managed it during the ensuing year, then removing to New York. Joseph Wooton next assumed control of the pottery, operating it about a year and a half, when he was succeeded by Charles Coxon, who managed the enterprise during a period of about the same duration, giving way to J. L. Rue & Co., a firm in which James Fish was a partner. About 1867, Rue withdrew from the firm, E. O. Howell becoming his successor, the firm being styled Fish & Howell. At the death of Mr. Fish, several years later, Mr. Howell became sole manager. After conducting it a year, he sold the pottery to Mr. H. C. Perrine, the present proprietor, who manufactures Rockingham and yellow-ware, employing about thirty hands, and consuming three hundred tons of clay per annum upon an average.

The Providence Pottery, near the Swan Hill Pottery, was established in 1876 by Joseph Wooton, its present proprietor, who manufactures Rockingham and yellow-ware, white majolica-ware, white and colored vases and plaques, employing thirty hands. This business occupies several buildings. The largest of these is twenty by forty feet and three stories high. The ground-floor is used as a press-room, and there the clay is prepared for manufacturing purposes. In the second story a portion of the ware is made. When finished and awaiting shipment it is stored in the third story, which is occupied as a wareroom. Another building is three stories high, with a basement. The basement is used as a store-room for prepared clay. The first floor is a store-room for ware in process of manufacture. The second and third floors are devoted to the manufacture of Rockingham and yellow-ware. A low building, sixteen by twenty feet, is known as the packing-room. There are two kiln-sheds. One of these is thirty-six by forty feet; the other eighteen by twenty feet. An average of one hundred tons of clay is used annually.

THE BERGEN IRON-WORKS.—The Bergen Iron-Works were established in 1832 by Joseph W. Brick, in Ocean (then Monmouth) County. Mr. Brick manufactured water- and gas-pipe until his death, in 1847. The business was afterwards managed by the executors of his will until 1859, when his son, R. A. Brick, who had attained to his majority, assumed the control of the business, which he removed to South Amboy in 1880, beginning the manufacture there of gas- and water-pipe in 1881. The works are located on the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad, half a mile from the centre of the village, and have a capacity of thirty-five tons per day. They consist of a foundry, one hundred and twenty-five by two hundred feet, and a machine-shop about thirty by eighty feet. Other buildings are in course of erection. The number of men required to run the works up to their full capacity is one hundred and twenty-five.

LESSER ENTERPRISES.—The township and village are well supplied with mechanics of various kinds. Prominent among these, in different branches of mechanical industry, may be mentioned Edwin Applegate, carriage-maker; William Brown, wheelwright; D. B. Bunting and John Thorp, shoemakers; August Ehrlich, harness-maker; J. A. Sexton, carpenter; Joseph Capner, house-mover; and J. W. Wallace, painter.

Burial-Places.—The people of South Amboy have only two burial-places in their vicinity. These are the cemetery of Christ Church and that of St. Mary's Catholic Church. Christ Church Cemetery is located at the outskirts of South Amboy village, and the first interment there was that of a German child, in August, 1868. The land embraced in this cemetery, about twelve and a half acres, was deeded to the wardens and vestrymen of Christ Church in 1868 by R. S. Conover and wife in consideration of one dollar. The cemetery is situated on an elevation one hundred and fifty feet above high-water mark, on the road to Matawan, and is laid out in lots fifteen by fifteen feet, which range in price from twenty dollars to one hundred dollars, according to location. Up to January, 1882, the total number of interments was one thousand and forty-three. A portion of the area is reserved for a chapel, school, and parsonage, it being intended to remove the Doane Memorial Chapel within this inclosure. The cemetery is under the management of a committee of three, appointed by the vestrymen of Christ Church. In 1868 this committee was constituted as follows: R. S. Conover, chairman; John Sexton, treasurer, and Richard McGuire. The present committee is composed of R. S. Conover, chairman; John Sexton, treasurer, and R. H. Rathburn. The fund received from the sale of the lots is devoted to the improvement of the cemetery. St. Mary's Catholic Cemetery is located on the road to Washington, about half a mile from the village of South Amboy, and has an area of five acres. It is laid out in lots twelve by eighteen feet, selling at forty dollars each, and is under the control of Rev. John Kelly, pastor of St. Mary's Church. The first burial therein was that of a Mrs. Byrnes in 1849. Her grave is unmarked, and her Christian name is not known to the writer.

Both of these cemeteries contain fine monuments, which were erected at considerable expense; both are well cared for and are being constantly improved, and bid fair to rank with some of the finest in the county at no distant day.

Educational.—PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The public schools of South Amboy compare favorably with those of any other similar township in the State. The first school within its present limits was a select school which was opened about 1841 in the old Union Chapel. The name of the teacher cannot be recalled. Sept. 11, 1843, John F. Hunter, now living in the village of South Amboy, began teaching in that building, and continued until May 27, 1848. Later a man named Jackson taught a few months. C. H. Knickerbocker taught between two and three years, and Oliver Cox for about the same length of time.

About 1850 a school-house was built and presented to the district by Mrs. John C. Stevens. It was enlarged about two years later at the expense of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. It stood at the intersection of Broadway and Main Street, and did service until two districts were established within the present township limits and new buildings were erected. These two districts are known as "Pack" District, No. 38, and "Raritan" District, No. 39. The school-houses in both are of recent erection, and are well ventilated and supplied with necessary school apparatus. The existence in South Amboy of two independent and leading public schools is a phenomenon of rare occurrence in any of the other towns or villages of the State. A single educational edifice of sufficient size to accommodate all the children erected in some central locality would in the first place have been more economical and effective, but as the schools are at the present constituted consolidation could not easily be effected.

In 1880 the amount of apportionment from the State appropriation to the school districts of South Amboy was as follows: No. 38, $1988.71; No. 39, $1442.35. In District No. 38, $530 was voted for building, purchasing, hiring, repairing, or furnishing public school houses; in District No. 39, $125. In District No. 39, $600 was voted to pay salaries of teachers. The amount of district tax ordered to be raised in District No. 38 was $530; in District No. 39, $725. The total amount received from all sources in District No. 38 was $2518.71, and in District No. 39 $2167.35.

The present value of school property is $13,000 in District No. 38, and $12,000 in District No. 39. The number of children of the school age in District No. 38 was 695 in 1880, and 480 in District No. 39. Schools were kept open ten months during the year. The average attendance in District No. 38 was 245, and in District No. 39, 172. It is estimated that 70 children in District No. 38, and 75 in District No. 39 attended private schools, and that 150 in the former and 90 in the latter did not attend schools of any kind.

Both school-houses are in very good condition. That in District No. 38 has a seating capacity of 400; that in District No. 39, 250. In District No. 38 one male and four female teachers were employed; four female teachers in District No. 39. The male teacher received a salary of $90 per month. The average salary of the female teachers in District No. 38 was $40, and in District No. 39, $55. District No. 38 has a school library of 176 volumes; District No. 39 has $20 toward a library fund.

Of Pack public school the educational staff is as follows: Prof. James Corkery, principal; Miss Kate L. McCoy, vice-principal; Miss Agnes H. Scudder, first assistant; Miss Sarah McAdams, second assistant. The instructors in Raritan public school are Miss Mary L. Thomas, principal; Miss M. E. Gunning, vice-principal; Miss M. B. Dayton, first assistant; Miss E. Albertson, second assistant; Miss Kate Bogert, third assistant.

The trustees in District No. 38 were R. H. Rathburn and William Birmingham in 1881, and in District No. 39, Thomas Keer and F. E. De Graw. The clerks of the two districts were C. H. Thompson and Josiah D. Stults respectively.

A comparison of the statistics above given with those of the schools of the township as it was bounded thirty years ago may not be uninteresting. In 1852 there were twelve school districts in the township; the number of children of the school age within its borders was $35; the whole number taught was 467; the amount of money raised for the support of schools by tax was $500; $442.18 was received from the State, and the total amount appropriated for educational purposes was $942.18.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS.—In the township there are four private schools, all more or less rudimentary in character. Of these, one is a parochial school and three are "pay" schools.

The parochial school is under the patronage of Rev. R. B. Post, rector of the Episcopal Church, and is taught by Mrs. D. Colver. The "pay" schools are respectively conducted by Miss Elizabeth A. Sexton, Miss Mary Sullivan, and Mr. Thomas Kirby.

There is no provision in the township for classical or collegiate education. It is the belief of many that there are materials in South Amboy for the organization and maintenance of a good boarding-school.

THE ORPHAN SCHOOL.—There is an orphan school in South Amboy which is known as the Episcopal Infant School. It is located on Main Street, adjacent to the property of Christ Church. It was organized at the desire of Mrs. T. A. Conover and a few other persons of South Amboy, with a view to caring for and teaching the young children of women who went out to work by the day and who had no means of providing for their care while absent from home. In the spring of 1857 a lot was given by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company to Miss Sophia C. Stevens, with the understanding that a building for the above-mentioned purpose should be erected upon it. The deed for this property was issued Jan. 15, 1858, and recorded in the office of the county clerk of Middlesex County, Feb. 12, 1859. In the mean time a substantial brick building was erected upon the lot by Miss Sophia C. Stevens, and completed in September, 1857. Mr. John C. Stevens, of South Amboy, died June 8, 1857, leaving a bequest in the hands of his sisters, Mrs. T. A. Conover, wife of Commodore T. A. Conover, of the United States navy, Miss Esther B. Stevens, and Miss Sophia C. Stevens, as trustees for the purpose of building, if necessary, an Episcopal Church and parsonage, or either, and establishing, endowing, and maintaining a school for children at South Amboy. The building for the school having been erected as stated, it was unnecessary to use any of the fund left by Mr. Stevens for that purpose. Neither was it used to erect a church or parsonage. The school was opened Oct. 1, 1857, with eleven children, ten of whom were named as follows: Susie Thomas, Lucy Letts, Phebe Letts, Mary Goble, Lucinda Buckelew, Edward Letts, James Goble, Chauncey Buckelew, John Roberts, and Manuel Roberts. The superintendent and instructor was Miss Caroline Craig, a lady of much ability, especially fitted to take charge of such an institution.

Experience soon proved that in a small village like the South Amboy of that time there were too few women going out to work by the day who had children to be taken care of to make it worth while to maintain a house exclusively for that purpose, and also that the plan of receiving both boys and girls would not be satisfactory. The charter of the school was consequently amended, and the trustees decided to receive only small girls, either orphans or half-orphans, and to so rear and instruct them as to render them eligible for situations as servants in first-class families. Dec. 27, 1858, the school building, with the lot on which it stands, was made over to the trustees by Miss Sophia C. Stevens, and Jan. 25, 1864, an additional lot was deeded to the trustees by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, that the children might have a larger play-ground. In 1864, Miss Grace Harkness succeeded Miss Craig in the management of the school, and was in time succeeded by Miss Ellen Packard, of Princeton, N. J. Miss Train was appointed matron in 1859, and was succeeded Oct. 1, 1867, by Miss E. C. Mish, who has been in charge continuously since that date, and is assisted by Miss Mary E. Tice. In 1870 the school building was much enlarged and improved by a gift from Miss Caroline Conover.

Children ranging from three to seventeen years of age are received, and control of them is retained until they attain to the age of eighteen; and at the age of seventeen good homes are provided for them, the number of scholars being limited to twenty, who must be at the time of admission residents either of New Jersey or Pennsylvania.

Christ Church (Episcopal).—Episcopal services were first held in South Amboy in 1850, in a small building erected by persons connected with the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, on Main Street, near the present house of worship of this parish, and which did service for a time as a meeting-house for the various Protestant denominations represented in the vicinity, and until the erection of the first public school-house also for the accommodation of the district school.

Services were held monthly by Rev. Joseph F. Phillips, rector at that time of St. Peter's Church at Spottswood, there being no parochial organization. Nov. 17, 1852, a meeting was called by notice given to the inhabitants of South Amboy to take into consideration the propriety of establishing Episcopal services in their midst, at which a parish was organized, the following-named persons and perhaps others becoming the constituent members of St. Stephen's Church of South Amboy:

Charles Fish and Dr. L. D. Morse were elected wardens; Edward R. Hanks, John C. Stevens, Abraham Everett, John Sexton, and Peter P. Voorhees were chosen vestrymen; Dr. L. D. Moore was elected parish clerk, and Peter P. Voorhees clerk of the vestry.

The membership of the church increased until in 1858 the little chapel was inadequate to the needs of the congregation. During that year Mrs. Esther B. Stevens erected the present large stone church and offered it to the wardens and vestrymen of St. Stephen's parish for use as a house of worship. It was consecrated in 1860 by Bishop William H. Odenheimer, D.D.

In 1862 a bill was passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey changing the name of the parish from St. Stephens's parish to Christ Church parish, as it has since been known.

In 1857 Rev. Charles L. Little became rector, and was succeeded Nov. 4, 1858, by Rev. Gideon J. Burton.

The present rector, Rev. R. B. Post, succeeded Mr. Burton Feb. 16, 1869.

It has been seen that this parish owes its existence to the benefactions of wealthy and zealous adherents of the church. These benefactions were such as to permanently establish it, and its perpetuity is in a measure assured by a continuance of the same. At his death Mr. John C. Stevens endowed this parish with six hundred dollars per annum, to be devoted to the payment of the salary of the rector. The large organ, so familiar to attendants at the church, was presented to the parish by Mrs. R. S. Conover. Mrs. E. J. Conover, Frank S. and R. S. Conover donated to the church the parsonage property, and offered to contribute one hundred dollars yearly for its maintenance. The old union church building was replaced in 1862 by a chapel erected by Miss C. Conover, and donated to the vestrymen for use as a chapel and parish school. A school is kept in it for the accommodation of the children of members of the congregation, and is in charge of Mrs. D. Culver. Mrs. J. C. Conover endowed this school with five thousand dollars, which was by her directed to be placed at interest for its benefit. There are twenty-five scholars, ranging from five to twelve years of age.

The Episcopal Sunday-school was organized with twenty-five scholars, Mrs. T. A. Conover being the first superintendent. The present wardens of Christ Church are R. S. Conover and John Sexton. The vestrymen are H. C. Perrine, P. S. Bogart, Frank E. De Graw, Richard McGuire, R. H. Rathburn, L. F. Meinzer, John L. Parker, William P. Rathburn, and Hugh Hutchinson. William P. Rathburn is treasurer, and Richard McGuire secretary.

Doane Memorial Chapel.—The Doane Memorial Chapel was erected in 1866 by Mrs. R. S. Conover, in memory of Rev. George Washington Doane, late bishop of the diocese of New Jersey. It stands on the road leading from South Amboy to Matawan, about a mile from South Amboy village, and was designed for use as a chapel and day-school for the accommodation of the poor in its neighborhood. Previous to 1877 no regular services were held there, but occasional services were held by the rectors of Christ Church, South Amboy, of which Doane Chapel is a station. During that year Rev. Frederick W. Wey began to officiate there, holding services twice each Sunday, preaching once in German and once in English. The first communicants there were Nelson Barkelew, Richard B. Hillman, Ambrose Gordon, John Weismann, Emma Barkelew, Mary Covert, Mary Weismann, Sophia Scheinbein, Louisa Click, and Rose Rodell. The communicants numbered forty-one in January, 1882.

This chapel is a wooden building, about seventy by twenty-five feet in size. It is the intention of Mr. R. S. Conover to remove it to a new location in Christ Church Cemetery, and to enlarge it and add greatly to its convenience by judicious alterations.

St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church is the oldest in South Amboy. Previous to 1849 its members were attended by the Rev. Father Rogers, the present venerable pastor of the Catholic Church of New Brunswick. After him came Fathers Sheridan and McCarthy.

In 1849, Rev. Michael A. Madden was appointed the first resident Catholic pastor of South Amboy. At that time the Catholics were few in number,—some twenty-five families only,—and in very moderate circumstances, nearly all being laborers in the employ of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. They had a small building which answered the purpose of a church. It was only eighteen by thirty-six feet in size, and had been built in 1846 on a portion of the Catholic cemetery lot. When Father Madden came the congregation was so large as to crowd this little meeting-place to overflowing, and in a short time he set to work to build a church. This the generosity of his people, though poor, enabled him to accomplish in a short time.

Rev. Father James Callen succeeded Father Madden, and remained pastor for nearly two years. The Rev. John A. Kelley, the present Catholic pastor, came to preside over the congregation October, 1854. After a few years he remodeled and considerably enlarged the church, and in 1864 built the rectory, and the church, a frame building thirty by ninety feet, was removed to an adjacent lot, where it is now used as a school-house and lecture-hall.

In 1873 it was determined to erect a new and more substantial building, fifty-nine by one hundred and fifteen feet, grander and more costly than any in the village. The corner-stone of the new church was laid Oct. 25, 1873, by Bishop (now Archbishop) Corrigan, a large number of people attending the ceremonies. The new church excited the wonder and admiration of all that so magnificent an edifice could be erected by a congregation the adult male members of which, with but few individual exceptions, depended on the shovel and the car-truck for the means of supporting their families. It must be mentioned that generous donations were received from many persons from all denominations. The church was dedicated and opened for divine service Sept. 17, 1876.

Father Kelley has had a wide field of labor in his parish, and in the earlier days of his pastorate it was almost wholly of a missionary character. As an evidence of appreciation of his long years of useful work in South Amboy, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorate was made the occasion of presenting him with a magnificent service of silver, for which people of all denominations contributed.

The present membership of St. Mary's Church is about eleven hundred.

The Methodist Episcopal Church.—Rev. L. W. Johnson was the first Methodist preacher who held meetings at South Amboy, conducting services in private houses as early as 1830. In 1832 he organized a class of eleven members, and services were held in the old Union Chapel, sometimes referred to as the "Railroad Chapel" from the fact that the ground on which it stood was donated by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company.

Rev. Mr. Johnson was located at South Amboy and remained there five years, assisted a portion of the time by Rev. Mr. Cross, of Staten Island, and Rev. John Littleton, of Perth Amboy. The Conference sent Rev. John Stockton to Mr. Johnson's assistance during the latter part of this period, and divided his labors between South Amboy and Washington, remaining after the close of Mr. Johnson's connection with the South Amboy class, and effecting, as is thought, the organization of the present church.

The church edifice which stands on Broadway near the centre of the village was built in 1853, and dedicated in March, 1854, by Bishop James, of New York. It was remodeled, enlarged, and painted in 1880. The original building committee consisted of the following-named persons: John Seward, Dana Nichols, — Hudnut, John Sexton, and John F. Hunter.

Rev. William Franklin succeeded Rev. John Stockton in 1855, and was the first pastor stationed in South Amboy and devoting himself exclusively to that church. His successors have been Revs. William Brook, 1857-58; William Osborn, 1858-61; — Sardis, 1861-63; William Chatten, 1863-65; William Racle, 1865-67; — Shock, 1867-69; — Owens, 1869-70; William Mickle, 1870-71; — Norris, 1871-73; Joseph Ashbrook, 1873-75; Samuel Chaten, 1875-77; Thomas Carman, 1877-79; J. J. Graw, 1879-80; and John Wilson, 1880. The church is at present without a pastor.

The First Presbyterian Church.—Previous to the year 1864 unsuccessful efforts were made from time to time by the Rev. G. C. Bush and others to form a Presbyterian Church at South Amboy. In 1864 a church was organized by the New Brunswick Presbytery with ten members and the following officers: Elders, A. H. Van Cleve and R. M. Dey; Trustees, A. H. Van Cleve; President, E. O. Howell; Treasurer, John Muirhead, Albert J. Rue, John Applegate, Alexander Southerland, and Matthew R. Dey.

In October, 1865, the Rev. W. C. Westervelt was installed as the first pastor. Meetings were held in the school-house. The present house of worship was completed in 1868, at a cost of nearly eleven thousand dollars, including the cost of the furniture.

The successive pastors have been as follows: Revs. William E. Westervelt, 1867-70; John Brash, 1871; Robert J. Burr, 1872-79. The present pastor, Rev. Rufus Taylor, D.D., was installed Aug. 21, 1879. The present number of members is sixty, with the following officers: Elders, Moses Laird and A. V. P. Jones; Deacons, A. Blodget and A. V. P. Jones; Trustees: President and Treasurer, A. V. P. Jones; Enoch Bergen, John Watson, G. W. Russell, Addison Bergen, Morris Voorhis, and James Griffith; R.

Taylor, D.D., clerk of sessions. Organist, Miss Emma Laird.

The Sabbath-school has been maintained from the organization of the church. The present number of scholars on the roll is ninety, with the following officers: A. V. P. Jones, superintendent; Addison Bergen, librarian; Charles Bergen, secretary; William Ingraham, treasurer; Miss Edith Roll, organist. The number of classes and teachers, nine.

The Methodist Protestant Church of South Amboy was organized Jan. 17, 1866, with sixteen members and Josiah D. Stults as class-leader. It was then under the pastoral care of Rev. O. Ellerson, of the Union Valley (Monroe) Methodist Protestant Church.

About two years later a house of worship was built. During the summer of 1880 it was repainted inside and out, and new carpets and other comforts were added.

The first trustees of this church were Josiah D. Stults, Peter L. Dey, and W. Woodhull Dey. The successive pastors have been Revs. O. Ellerson, L. D. Stults, E. D. Stults, J. W. Laughlin, P. S. Vreeland, J. Shepherd, F. Stringer, J. H. Algoe, and the present incumbent, G. S. Robinson.

The present membership is seventy. There is a flourishing Sunday-school in connection with this church, numbering one hundred and fifteen scholars.

The First Baptist Church.—Previous to the year 1871 no Baptist meetings were held in South Amboy. In the early days of the Camden and Amboy Railroad the Rev. Mr. Honsell, a Baptist, and ministers of other denominations visited the place occasionally, and held services in the old Union chapel and school-house that stood at what now is the junction of Broadway and Main Street.

On the 12th day of December, 1871, the missionary committee appointed by the Trenton Baptist Association convened in South Amboy for the purpose of advancing the interests of their denomination. The committee consisted of Rev. D. B. Stout, of Middletown; Rev. F. S. Griffith, of Holmdel; and Rev. D. S. Parmlee, of Freehold, who met at the house of Mr. W. W. Cook. At this meeting nine residents, members of the Baptist denomination, associated themselves together to form a church, and in the evening service was held in the basement of Concert Hall by Rev. Mr. Stout. This little band met often for prayer at the residences of the different members, and on Jan. 14, 1872, the meetings were transferred to the basement of Concert Hall, where services were held morning and evening by Brother Horace Waters, of New York City. On the 26th of the same month, after a sermon by the Rev. James Huggins, a meeting was held, with Thomas Baker, moderator, and R. Beman, clerk, when the articles of faith and covenant were read and adopted, and signed by twenty members.

On Feb. 11, 1873, a council was held, composed of representatives of the Middletown, Bordentown, Trenton (First), Freehold, and Hightstown Churches, which organized the First Baptist Church of South Amboy. Thomas Baker and W. W. Cook were elected deacons; Isaac Van Duzen, Joseph Carman, Joseph Jackson, Thomas Lingle, and Timothy Woodruff a board of trustees; Robert Ayres, clerk; and W. W. Cook, treasurer.

The church was supplied from week to week until Oct. 2, 1873, when a call was extended to the Rev. Thomas S. Snow, which was accepted, and Mr. Snow entered upon his duties November 1st following.

A brick church edifice was commenced in August, 1875, but was not completed until 1878. The building, which has a seating capacity of two hundred and fifty, was dedicated and opened for service March 27th of that year.

The Rev. Mr. Snow resigned Aug. 1, 1877, and on September 11th following the Rev. D. D. Read was called to the pastorate. He resigned April 24, 1879, and on July 10th following a call was extended to the Rev. L. H. Copeland, who entered upon his pastoral labors August 22d. He served the church until Feb. 1, 1881.

The present pastor, Rev. D. S. Mulhern, was called Feb. 10, 1881.

The present membership numbers sixty-one. The officers are: Deacons, Thomas Baker and Joseph Jackson; Treasurer, Joseph Jackson; Clerk, James Dykes; Trustees, Phineas Mundy, Thomas Blakesley, Bernard Roddy, Benjamin Green, and Samuel L. Durand.

The Sunday-school of the First Baptist Church was organized in January, 1872, with less than ten scholars. W. W. Cook was elected superintendent, and Miss Carrie Cook, treasurer. The library and other property of the school was carried in a wicker basket to Concert Hall, where the earlier sessions were held. At the present time there are seventy-five scholars enrolled, and the officers are as follows: Bernard Roddy, superintendent; Harry Ayres, assistant superintendent; Miss M. E. Gunning, treasurer; Henry A. Snow, secretary; and Charles H. Roddy, librarian. The library contains three hundred volumes.

Lodges, Societies, and Bands.—GEN. MORGAN LODGE, No. 96, I. O. O. F., of South Amboy, was instituted Aug. 2, 1849, with the following officers: Peter P. Voorhees, N. G.; Letchworth Cox, V. G.; Alfred A. Miller, Sec.; Charles A. Clark, Asst. Sec.; Charles Fish, Treas.

The lodge now numbers sixty-six members, and meets every Tuesday evening in Howell's Hall. The officers in 1881 were Robert Shepherd, N. G.; George Bond, V. G.; C. P. Thomas, Sec.; James Betchel, P. S.; David Watson, Treas.

ST. STEPHEN'S LODGE, No. 63, F. AND A. M., was chartered Jan. 22, 1863, with the following charter officers, they comprising the membership: Robert Walker, W. M.; John Sexton, S. W.; J. Watson, J. W.; M. R. Day, R. Stewart, J. Capner, J. Stewart,

J. Sharp. The first lodge-room was over the store of W. C. Perrine. After the erection of Concert Hall they occupied the upper rooms of that building for several years. In 1871 the lodge returned to the hall over W. C. Perrine's store. In 1873, on the completion of B. F. Howell's building, the upper floor was fitted up by St. Stephen's Lodge and Gen. Morgan Lodge, I. O. O. F., and both occupy it at the present time.

The following are the Past Masters and the year of service: Robert Walker, 1863; John Sexton, 1864 and 1865; M. R. Dey, 1866-67 and 1869; Hiram McConnell, 1868; John B. Vancleve, 1871-72; Ambrose Treganowan, 1873 and 1875; William S. Young, 1874; Rollin H. Guild, 1876-77; Bernard Roddy, 1878-79; Samuel L. Durand, 1880-81.

The following are the newly-elected and appointed officers for 1882: George R. Dingle, W. M.; Charles C. Pearce, S. W.; John V. P. Bissett, J. W.; George W. Jaques, Treas.; Richard Maguire, Sec.; Samuel L. Durand, W. M. S. D.; Charles H. Southwick, J. D.; Rev. G. S. Robinson, Chaplain; Bernard Roddy, P. M. M. of C.; John H. Green, M. of C.; George L. Everett, Steward; William Mathis, Steward; Samuel C. James, Tyler.

The lodge numbers about seventy-five members, and meets the first and third Monday evenings of each month in Howell's Hall.

ST. PATRICK'S BENEVOLENT SOCIETY, No. 2, was organized Oct. 10, 1869, with Rev. John A. Kelly, president; John Rea, Sr., vice-president; William Sullivan, secretary; John F. Rea, corresponding secretary; Patrick Campion, treasurer.

A charter for this society was granted April 10, 1870. The present officers are Rev. John A. Kelly, president; William Rea, 1st vice-president; L. Dolan, Sr., 2d vice-president; Patrick Campion, treasurer; William Birmingham, secretary; Michael Welch, corresponding secretary; George Cheeseman, marshal; Richard Burdon, sergeant-at-arms; Patrick Torlan, Patrick Connoll, John Lyons, James Collins, and William Merrick, investigating committee; L. Goode, Thomas Shanaphy, and John Torlan, visiting committee; Charles H. Thompson, John Sutcliff, and Stephen Lucid, auditing committee; M. P. Byrne, William Minck, and Adam Rea, trustees of the widows and orphan's fund.

The present membership is one hundred. Meetings are held in St. Mary's Hall on the second Sunday in each month.

GOOD SAMARITAN LODGE, No. 52, K. OF P., was organized June 29, 1870. The officers were installed by A. W. Mayo, D. D. G. C., of New Brunswick, assisted by a number of the officers of Friendship Lodge of New Brunswick, and Algonquin Lodge of Perth Amboy.

The first officers were Joseph Wooton, C. C.; William Wooton, V. C.; Levi Vooton, prelate; Bernard Roddy, M. of E.; Albert Roll, M. of F.; Isaac

H. Holmes, K. of R. S.; Richard H. Herring, M. A.; Robert Dykes, I. G.; John M. Voorhees, O. G.

The officers in 1881 were as follows: Joseph Jackson, C. C.; Charles H. Dey, V. C.; Arthur W. Bostwick, P.; Thomas Baker, M. of E.; J. F. Fulton, M. of F.; Robert Dykes, K. of R. S.; Charles Berrian, M. A.; Andrew Newman, I. G.; Garrett Hendnute, O. G.; Trustees, Bernard Roddy, William B. Endicott, and J. F. Fulton.

This lodge meets every Wednesday evening in Concert Hall building, up-stairs.

SENECA TRIBE, No. 23, I. O. of R. M., is of comparatively recent organization, and, like Good Samaritan Lodge, No. 52, Knights of Pythias, meets in the lodge-room over Concert Hall. In 1881 it had a membership of fifty, and was officered as follows: James McKenna, Sachem; George Story, S. S.; Charles P. Thomas, J. S.; Aaron Culver, W. P.; Isaac Slover, K. W.; John Berlew, G. W.; Clark Mundy, G. F.; Tobias Grace, C. R.; C. B. Pearce, A. C. R.

The committee of Good Samaritan Lodge, Knights of Pythias, and Seneca Tribe of the Improved Order of Red Men, No. 23, recently completed the refurnishing of their lodge-room over Concert Hall, from the proceeds of a late fair and festival, at a cost of about two hundred and seventy-five dollars. Besides a new carpet and matting, three new chandeliers were placed in the room. Four elegant walnut upholstered chairs for the officers were added, and canopies of rich material were erected over the officers' stations.

ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS, No. 1, of South Amboy, was organized Dec. 10, 1873, with the following officers: County Delegate, P. McDonald; Pres., S. Scully; Vice-Pres., M. Lucid; Fin. Sec., E. McDonough; Rec. Sec., J. Murphy; Treas., Martin Berry.

The officers in 1881 were as follows: Prest., Daniel Coyne; Vice-Prest., Philip McDonald; Fin. Sec., Daniel Duryer; Rec. Sec., Patrick Coghlin; Treas., Martin Berry.

The membership at that time was sixty, and the division met the second Sunday of each month.

ST. MARY'S TEMPERANCE AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—At a meeting called by the pastor of St. Mary's Catholic Church, April 7, 1872, it was resolved to form a temperance society. The pastor was appointed president pro tem., and an election of officers was held which resulted as follows: Rev. John A. Kelley, president; Edward Gleason, treasurer; Thomas Bowe, secretary; James Manahan, Michael Mahone, Thomas Maguire, and Matthew Connell, investigating committee.

The constituent members were Michael Mahone, James Manahan, James Collins, Michael Kennedy, Thomas Finley, Matthew Connell, Jeremiah Lynch, Michael Noland, John Powell, Michael Corbit, Peter Migher, James Migher, James Britt, Martin Duggan, William Dollton, Patrick Morris, Welton Costello, Thomas Maguire, John Wood, Timothy Burns, Stephen Cannon, Bernard Cannon, and Patrick McDermond.

This society was designed both to inculcate upon its members the principles of abstinence from alcoholic liquors as a beverage, and for their mutual benefit when deprived by sickness of the means of earning their livelihood, a funeral benefit of thirty dollars being paid upon the death of a member. It meets at St. Mary's Hall on the third Sunday in each month, and the membership is ninety-six.

The present officers are as follows:

James H. Gordon, president; Edward H. Shanaphy, vice-president; Richard Burden, treasurer; John Sutcliff, secretary; George Cheeseman, corresponding secretary; Matthew McGovern, marshal; James Collins, messenger; Christopher Dole, sergeant-at-arms; Thomas Bowe, Patrick Coan, Michael Halton, John Mulery, and Thomas Mason, investigating committee; William Birmingham, Patrick Cleary, and Michael Byrnes, auditing committee; N. Scott, Thomas Byrnes, Matthew McGovern, Neil Leary, and James Collins, sick committee.

COMMODORE CONOVER POST, No. 2, G. A. R., Department of New Jersey, was instituted March 11, 1878, with the following officers:

F. W. Reeder, Commander; A. L. Rue, S. V. C.; John D. Cottrell, J. V. C.; John B. Morrell, Q. M.; Dr. L. O. Morgan, S.; William Dykes, C.; H. A. Snow, A.; John Ibbs, O. D.; Hugh Capner, O. G.; Jacob Buckelew, S. M.; Joseph Swift, Q. M. S.

The last annual election of officers of this post to date was held on Monday, Dec. 11, 1881, when the following comrades were chosen to the offices mentioned:

P. C., Gideon H. Hutchinson; S. V. C., Philip Stump; J. V. C., Walling Wainwright; Q. M., James Mattson; Chap., William L. Davis; Surg., Hugh Capner; O. D., Hugh Hutchinson; O. G., M. B. Kelley; Delegate to Dept. Encampment, James Mattson; Alternate, M. B. Kelley; Past P. C., Joseph Swift, Hugh Hutchinson, Hugh Capner.

This organization numbers about thirty veterans of the late war, and meets every Monday evening at Concert Hall.

CORNET BANDS.—The South Amboy Liberty Band was organized in 1869, with John F. Rea as leader. It now numbers sixteen members, led by Daniel Reagan.

The Citizens' Band was organized Dec. 1, 1880, and contains eighteen pieces. The leader is William P. Rathburne.

CHAPTER CIV.

RARITAN TOWNSHIP.

Natural Features.—Raritan was set off from parts of Woodbridge and Piscataway townships on the 17th of March, 1870.

This township has a somewhat diversified soil. In some parts, towards the Union County line (continuation of Short Hills), the soil is generally a stiff clay loam, while that of the plains is mostly a sandy loam, being a transition formation of the old red sandstone. All are, however, fertile under proper cultivation, and the township may vie with the neighboring townships of Piscataway and Woodbridge in the variety and quantity of agricultural products. This township is well watered by the Raritan River, which lies upon the southerly border, and also by some smaller streams, which pass through the township. The highways and roads are kept generally in good condition, and in some instances shade-trees are planted along their sides, adding much to the natural beauty of the scenery.

Early Settlements.—This territory having been parts of Piscataway and Woodbridge until 1870, the same family names appear, with few exceptions, among its pioneer settlers.

The Fitz Randolph family are supposed to be descended from the ancient Fitz Randolphs of Yorkshire, in England, mention of whom we find many centuries ago. As early as the time of William the Conqueror, the name of Count Herald Fitz Randolph is mentioned (in the Domesday Book ordered by King William) among those nobles who accompanied him to England, and upon whom he settled various estates. From the "Annals of the Church of Middleham," a work by the Rev. William Atthill, canon and sub-dean of Middleham, we ascertain that the manor of Middleham was bestowed by William the Conqueror upon his nephew, Alan Rufus, after the conquest of England, and that Alan Rufus, dying without issue in A.D. 1089, bequeathed the manor and honor of Middleham to his younger brother, Ribald, whose grandson, Robert Fitz Randolph, of Yorkshire, Lord of Middleham, built upon it the castle of Middleham; and from Robert Fitz Randolph, Lord of Middleham, it passed in regular succession to his lineal descendants (male and female) until it came into the hands of King Henry VI. of England upon the forfeiture of Robert Neville, Earl of Salisbury (the earl being a descendant in the female line of the above Robert Fitz Randolph, Lord of Middleham). In A.D. 1265 we find Lady Mary Fitz Randolph, daughter of Ralph Fitz Randolph, third Lord of Middleham, married Robert Neville, Earl of Raby.

In A.D. 1450, Lady Catherine Fitz Randolph, daughter of Ralph Fitz Randolph, Esq., was married to Sir Christopher Danby, judge of the Court of Common Pleas to King Edward IV. Notwithstanding the forfeiture to the English crown (in the reign of King Henry VI.) of the estate of Middleham, the Fitz Randolphs still clung affectionately to their old domain, and we find Sir Ralph Fitz Randolph and Lady Elizabeth, his wife, as late as A.D. 1557 yet remaining at their seat of "Spennythorne Hall," within one mile of the old "Middleham Castle" of Sir Ralph's ancestors, the ancient Fitz Randolphs, Lords of Middleham. Lady Elizabeth, wife of Sir Ralph Fitz Randolph, of Spennythorne Hall, was daughter and heiress of Lord Scope, of the barony of Mesham and also of Upsal; and Lady Elizabeth F. Randolph was heiress of the above baronies after the death of her mother; she (Lady Agnes Fitz Randolph) married Sir Marquanduke Nyvil, of Constable Barton, member of Parliament for Ripon.

Edward Fitz Randolph, of the Fitz Randolphs of Yorkshire, England, the founder of the family in America, was born A.D. 1615. He came with his mother, the Widow Fitz Randolph (as she is styled in the records of that day), to New England in 1630, and was married May 10, 1637, to Elizabeth Blossom, of Barnstable, Mass. (daughter of Thomas Blossom, one of the "Pilgrim Fathers"). Edward Fitz Randolph and Elizabeth Blossom had nine children,—Nathaniel, Hannah, Mary, John, Joseph, Elizabeth, Thomas, Hope, Benjamin.

About the year 1668, Edward Fitz Randolph and Elizabeth Blossom, his wife, with their unmarried children, John, Joseph, Elizabeth, Thomas, Benjamin, and perhaps Hope, removed from Massachusetts to this township, then called Piscataway, in the province of New Jersey. Edward died shortly afterwards, and his widow, Elizabeth Blossom Fitz Randolph, was allowed in A.D. 1676, by the honorable the proprietors of the province, to locate land in the right of her deceased husband, which she did, as appears by patent to her for three hundred acres in Piscataway, the patent being dated March 31, 1676. There are also other patents to her and to other members of the family on record for thousands of acres of land besides in Piscataway, "Province of New Jersey." Elizabeth Blossom Fitz Randolph deeded, June 26, 1685, a large amount of the lands which she had located to her sons, Joseph, John, Thomas, and Benjamin, and four days after she married her second husband, Capt. John Pike.

Edward Fitz Randolph was a man of note, and is mentioned in the records of Barnstable, Mass., as one of the earliest of that town. But a short account can be given of all the branches of this family, at the present but one interesting historic account of Edward Fitz Randolph, seventh and youngest child of Edward and Phebe, who was born 23d day, 4th month, 1749, about three miles west of Rahway, N. J., and when Gen. Washington with his army was located in the vicinity, he got Edward to show him to some prominent point where he could overlook the movements of the enemy, and he took him to what is now known as Washington's Rock, on the mountain back of Plainfield. Washington watched the movements of the enemy (in company with Edward) during the skirmish between the troops of Sir William Howe and Lord Stirling, near Plainfield, in the campaign of 1777, also during the retreat of his army from the swamps near Rahway.

Edward was the fifth in line from Edward of the first generation in America. He married 26th day, 11th month, 1782, Mary Webster, near Rahway, and had eight children,—Phebe, Sarah, Mercy, Hugh, Mary, Edward, Ira, and Asa.

The Stelle family, whose progenitor in this country was one Pontius Stelle, a Huguenot, born in France, and emigrated to Staten Island with other French Huguenots between the years 1668-75, is largely represented in this township, and the beautiful town of Stelton, situated on the Pennsylvania Railroad, is named after them. The Rev. Benjamin Stelle, a distinguished Baptist minister at an early day, was the elder son of Pontius Stelle, and was born in New York in the year 1683, and ordained a pastor of the Piscataway (Stelton) Baptist Church about the year 1739. He continued in this relation till January, 1759, or about twenty years, when he was called to his rest at the good old age of seventy-six years. He united the office of magistrate with that of pastor.

In the judgment of his cotemporaries he was a popular preacher and very upright in the administration of justice. He was succeeded in the pastorate of the Stelton Church by his son Isaac, who had been ordained as assistant to his father in 1752. He took the exclusive oversight of the church in 1759. "I need not," says Edwards, "publish the goodness of the man or the excellence of his preaching, for many are now alive who know both and who regard him as their spiritual father. He was remarkable for his travels among the American churches in company with his other self, Rev. Benjamin Miller." He died Oct. 9, 1781, in the sixty-third year of his age, after a pastorate of twenty-two years and a ministry of twenty-nine years.

Thus have we referred to the early members of the Stelle family, in order to show that this now extensive family in this township are not only the first who settled here, but are also the first in organizing the church, schools, and many beneficial enterprises for the improvement of this township when it was a wilderness.

The Rev. Isaac Stelle had among others two sons, Joseph and Samuel. Joseph had a son Isaac, who had five sons, namely, Samuel, who died some twenty-five years since; Lewis R., who was for some fifteen years the proprietor of the New Brunswick Times, and subsequently of the Paterson Guardian, and has been engaged in the silk business in New York State; Augustus and James, who are now residents of Stelton; and Alexander, who died in youth. Isaac Stelle lived a long, active, useful, and blameless life, and died as one who, wearied of his labors,

"Wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

He reached the age of eighty-four. His widow, an intelligent and worthy lady, still survives.

John Barron is made mention of in the records. He was one of the prominent movers in building St. James' P. E. Church, and for many years held possession as warden. Dec. 24, 1714, he sends with others a communication from the vestry of this church. He is represented as a prominent man in Piscataway Town.

Thomas Wetherel was among the early settlers prior to 1700, and also interested in the new St. James' Church, of which he was a warden.

John Molleson was a freeholder in 1668. He took up an allotment of land. He was for many years connected with others in arranging the boundary lines, and was a vestryman in the early church in Piscataway. His brother, Gilbert Molleson, was one of the claimants under the Indian titles and the Nicolls grant.¹

William Hodgson is represented as having been connected with the building of St. James' Church and as vestryman in 1714. He was among the first settlers in Piscataway Town. Many of the name are now residents in the county.

Robert Webster is among the first named as a freeholder and as a proprietor in 1669; a member of the Episcopal Church in Piscataway Town.

Hopewell Hull was from New Haven. His father, Andrew Hull, was one of the first settlers in Connecticut. Benjamin and his brother Hopewell are represented in a grant dated Dec. 18, 1666, in Piscataway, and among others of the township Benjamin Hull, 30th of May, 1668, was announced as an associate. Hopewell Hull was prominent in establishing the church in Piscataway Town, and for many years as one of the vestrymen of the parish. (See Piscataway township.)

Henry Langstaff came from Piscataqua, Me., in 1666, and was a freeholder in 1682. His name is found in the civil list, holding township offices, at an early date. He was interested in the church, holding official relations thereto in 1714 in Piscataway Town. Mention is made of Mr. Langstaff in Piscataway township.

Samuel Walker was also an early settler. His name is often mentioned in relation to the affairs of township and church. The family are largely represented throughout the county. John Jennings (or Gennings, as it is sometimes spelled) is mentioned in a communication from the vestry in Piscataway Church in relation to building, etc.

1714, but little is now known of the family in the township.

Royce. In the early records "There were plantations both above and below the town of Piscataway on the Raritan River, and some lands were located on Millstone River." "John Royce, with Governor Carteret and Thirteen other Associates," had plantations, or were interested in the lands on the River Raritan. Their deeds were obtained in 1861.¹ Mr. Royce held a patent which contained about twenty thousand acres. Samuel Royce, probably a son of John, is mentioned with others in Piscataway Town in connection with building the first church and acting as one of its officers, Dec. 24, 1714.

The following familiar names of the early settlers are still to be found as residents of the township, and in some instances still occupying and owning lands of these ancestors: Acken, Blake, Lang, Laing, Kelly, Robbins, Edgar, Compton, McPherson, Laforge, Laflower, Agen, Andross, Andrews, Stelle, Fitz Randolph, Sage, Jaques, Hunt, Row, Roe, Ralph, Roth, Ellison, Lodge, Farrote, Martin, Lupardus, Meeker, Dunham, Hardy, Livingston, Whitehead, Dunn, Tappin, Sandford, Lambert, Hoyt, Campbell, Bloomfield, Giles, Dunn, Martin, Bonham, Manning, Mundy or Mundage, Stelle, Thomal, Ford or Foard, Talmadge or Talmage, Freeman, Hampton, Thomas, Pain or Payne, Kelley. These families came to a wilderness inhabited by Indians, and here they were compelled to build their homes, clear the lands of the first growth of timber, which was said to have been immense in size, "many of the stumps," as an old record affirms, being "over thirty feet in circumference.

Although the allotment of a portion of the common lands for the benefit of schools is evidence of the interest in education felt by the first settlers, yet there was no action on the part of the town (then Woodbridge) to effect the establishment of a school until 1689. This was in March of that year, and James Fullerton, who owned lands with his brother, near what is now Plainfield township, and near the Oak-Tree School, as it was called, in this township, was employed as "schoolmaster."

In 1694 it appears that one John Conger was opposed to a free school for the next year, which Mr. Brown was desired to teach at a salary of twenty-four pounds, and Mr. Conger protested against the school over his signature, which was that of "his mark." We next learn of John Baker, in the same year, being employed "to teach for six months on trial," he to keep "ye school this winter time until nine o'clock at night."

During the Revolutionary war, and until about 1784, there were no schools taught. A tax upon dogs was appropriated for schooling poor children.

The present school districts in the township are named Lafayette, Fairfield, Oak-Tree, New Durham, Friendship, No. 10, and the old Franklin school-house. The names of Miss Abigail Thomas, Mr. Lane, Mr. Tibbitts, Mr. Fuller, Mr. Alpheus, W. Kellogg, 1839, J. Newton Smith.

The Metuchen school-house in the year 1842 was removed, and the present substantial building has taken its place, finished in 1871 at a cost of about $9000.

About the year 1860, Prof. William Hopkins opened a select school in the academy under prosperous auspices, as did Mr. L. P. Cowles a few years after.

The Piscataway town school was built in 1695. It was situated on a part of lands conveyed to Messrs. Drake, Hull, Higgins, and Slater by the proprietors of the province of East Jersey, dated March 5, 1695. It was built of logs, and "had ample play-ground." It was situated adjacent to the present burial-ground, on the southerly side of the road leading through the town. About the year 1800 it was abandoned and a new house built at a greater distance from the public road. This was a small unpainted building, with rude desks against the walls and seats made of oak planks or slabs,—a fair specimen perhaps of most of the country schools of that day. The fearful tornado which swept over this section of country on the 19th day of June, 1835, destroying so much property, demolished in its course the school building of this place. Much damage was done to property in the neighborhood, and the inhabitants were compelled to delay the building of another school-house until 1837, when a two-story building was erected by subscription.

In 1852 this building was enlarged at a cost of $331, defrayed by special tax. After this enlargement a female teacher was employed and a female department established. Repairs were again made upon this building in 1871, and the pupils supplied with modern desks. More recently (1875) this building was extensively repaired and put in a condition of neatness and comfort worthy of its historic character. Z. T. Martin taught in this school for more than forty years, a testimony to his character and worth of no small significance.

The following statistical report of schools of this township will not be without interest:

The whole number of children enrolled is 641; value of school property, $18,900; number of male teachers, 1; female teachers, 10.

Quakers.—For the convenience of a number of the Society of Friends residing in this vicinity, a weekly meeting was begun Oct. 16, 1725, at John Laing's, the distance being too great to the meeting-house in Woodbridge, especially during the season of bad roads. John Laing lived at or near Plainfield (Town, now New Brooklyn), and it was certainly a long distance for him to ride every "First-day." He bequeathed to the Friends a plot of ground on which to build a meeting-house, and on the 27th of March, 1731, the Woodbridge Monthly Meeting gave permission for its construction, directing that it should not exceed in its dimensions twenty-four feet square, and fourteen feet "between joyns." It was completed and all accounts settled by the latter part of the year 1736. About the year 1787 the meeting was removed to Plainfield; the building was also removed thither and used for a time, until the present building was finished in 1789. All trace of the former place and burying-ground in the Short Hills is now lost.¹

Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church (Metuchen), situated on the corner of Main Street and Middlesex Avenue, is a neat building, with belfry and ample plot of land for enlarging the building when so desired. It was for many years the desire of a few Methodist families in this town to have regular services, and in the year 1866 the academy was offered them. In the fall (October) of 1866 an organization was effected under the corporate name of the Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church of Metuchen, and the following gentlemen signed the certificate of incorporation: Walter S. Petit, Robert Idell, Isaac M. Whittier, Henry F. Coon, Robert Petit, and Rev. M. Daly. The Rev. J. S. Coit, pastor of Woodbridge Methodist Episcopal Church, became the stated supply from April, 1866, until the spring of 1867, when the Conference sent them Rev. I. L. Gilder.

The present edifice was commenced in 1863, and dedicated in April, 1869. The following have filled the pastorate according to the usage of the Methodist Episcopal Church:

Rev. E. G. Thomas, who had graduated at Rutgers College, was sent as their stated supply by the Conference of 1863. He, unfortunately, had to resign in a few months on account of a bronchial affection. He gave promise of great usefulness, and was an excellent preacher.

Rev. J. J. Reed, now of the Washington Avenue Church, New York, was sent to fill the term until Conference, when the Rev. Edward Wilson, a resident of Metuchen, was appointed in 1869 as pastor. The Rev. J. H. Manaton, 1871; H. M. Simpson, Rev. T. H. Oaks, P. G. Blight, 1873; E. M. Garton, 1874; Isaac C. Decker, 1874; J. R. Adams, 1879; and the present pastor, Rev. W. D. Cammens, formerly a member of the North Ohio Conference, is now the stated pastor. Sittings, three hundred; membership, seventy-five; Sabbath-school officers and teachers, twelve; scholars, sixty.

New Dover Methodist Episcopal Church.—A few families of Methodists had settled in the small hamlet of New Dover, and for years had attended church in Rahway and Woodbridge, with occasional preaching in the school-house in the neighborhood. It had been long contemplated building a small church for their use, but not until the year 1847, when this charge was united with the Woodbridge Church and supplied on the Sabbath with regular preachers, was the work undertaken in earnest. In the year 1848 ground was broken and a neat frame church erected at a cost of about two thousand seven hundred dollars. At this time there was a membership of about eighteen, and a class was formed, Rev. Abraham Owens having the supervision, in connection with the Woodbridge Church. At the Conference, 1850, it was made a separate charge, and the Rev. J. R. Adams was sent; 1851, Rev. R. S. Arndt; 1853, Rev. R. B. Lockwood; 1855, Rev. Jeremiah Cowins, and the membership had increased to fifty-five members; 1857, Rev. Rodney Winans. In the former year Metuchen was united to New Dover, and Rev. William H. McCormick was sent, but was made a separate charge in 1858, and Rev. Joseph H. Dandy was sent as the regular minister, and remained until the spring of 1861, and was supplied by the elder,

John S. Porter, and 1862, Rev. H. B. Edwards was sent; 1864, Rev. John Coyle; 1865, Rev. E. F. Hadley; 1866, Rev. Bartholomew Weed; 1867, Rev. James Irvine; 1868, Rev. A. Vandusen; 1870, Rev. Theodore D. Frazee; 1872, Rev. Joseph W. Dally; 1874, Rev. J. W. Miles; 1875, Rev. L. T. James; 1878, Rev. H. M. Simpson; 1879, Rev. W. W. Stevens; 1880, Rev. C. O. Mead; 1881, supplied by Rev. L. R. Dunn. The church has been improved within a few years. It is situated in an agricultural district and some miles from the railroad.

Stelton Baptist Church.—The Baptists were the first to establish religious services in this township, in 1683, being a part of Piscataway township, and at this early date "the names of Hugh Dunn, who was an exhorter; John Drake, afterwards the pastor; Nicholas Bonham, John Smalley, Edmund Dunham, afterwards minister of the Seventh-Day Baptists, and John Fitz Randolph. It is not to be doubted but the said men had wives, or sisters, or daughters of the same way of thinking." They soon after received additions to their numbers by the arrival of a company from Tipperary, Ireland. Messrs. Drake and Dunham and also Mr. Hugh Dunn are said by Benedict to have preached in Piscataway prior to 1689, although unordained; but in the spring of that year, when the church was constituted, the Rev. Thomas Killingsworth visited the town, organized a congregation, and ordained Mr. Drake, who continued as the pastor thereafter until his death in 1739. He bore an excellent character. He had three wives, by whom he had six sons—Isaac, Abraham, Francis, John, Benjamin, and Samuel—and two daughters,—Sarah and Rebecca.¹ The Rev. Henry Lovell was associated with him towards the close of his career.

The successor of Mr. Drake was Benjamin Stelle, of French parentage, but born in New York, "a popular preacher and upright magistrate." He continued in charge of the congregation until his death, in January, 1759, in his seventy-sixth year, having been assisted in his ministerial labors for several years by his son, Isaac Stelle, who continued to officiate for nearly twenty-three years after the death of his father, and died Oct. 9, 1781, in his sixty-third year, highly esteemed. In company with the Rev. Benjamin Miller, Mr. Stelle travelled much among the Baptists of America. He married Christiana Clarkson, by whom he had six sons,—Benjamin, John, Abel, Joseph, Oliver, and Samuel. The Rev. Reune Runyon succeeded Mr. Stelle in 1783, having been called to the ministry in 1771, when thirty years of age. He was ordained at Morristown in March, 1772, where he remained until 1780. Mr. Runyon died in November, 1811, having been assisted in his labors part of the time by Henry Smalley. "He was remarkable for dexterity in administering baptism." "On 30th June, 1786, a gentleman held his watch in his hand till he had baptized thirty in fifty-eight minutes." His wife was Ann Bray, by whom he had five daughters—Ann, Rachel, Charlotte, Matilda, and Isabella—and three sons,—Vincent, Daniel, Reune.²

The Rev. James McLaughlin, then pastor of the Baptist Church at Kingwood, N. J., was called to succeed Mr. Runyon, and entered upon his duties in October, 1812. A portion of the congregation resided in New Brunswick, where a convenient meeting-house had been built two years before, and as there was no parsonage in "Piscataway" (Stelton), Mr. McLaughlin took up his residence there, holding his services at both places,—at Stelton in the morning of each Lord's Day, and in New Brunswick in the afternoon. On the 1st of September, 1816, the members of the congregation residing in New Brunswick, twenty-three in number, were formed into a separate church.

Mr. McLaughlin continued to serve both congregations until his resignation, which was presented Oct. 19, 1817. He is remembered by many as a worthy man and excellent minister, grave in his deportment, and unusually solemn in his pulpit addresses.

The congregation was without a pastor about a year, but on the 1st of October, 1818, the Rev. William Dodge, of Wilmington, Del., took it under his charge, and for nearly fourteen years continued its efficient and exemplary pastor, attracting the people to him by a happy union of dignity and affability in his deportment, his neatness of person, and becoming walk and conversation, and though dead still lives in the warm affections of many of his flock. During the pastorate of Mr. Dodge the congregation prospered materially. In February, 1825, it was determined to erect a new house of worship on the site of the old one (the old church was properly the one built in 1686), and so vigorously was the building prosecuted that in the following October it was dedicated. It cost three thousand dollars. When he first entered upon his duties Mr. Dodge resided in New Brunswick, as his predecessor had done, but in 1830 removed to a farm near the Piscataway meeting-house. On his resignation he removed to Newark, and became the pastor of the First Baptist Church there in 1832.

The Rev. Daniel D. Lewis succeeded Mr. Dodge in June, 1833, and remained in charge of the congregation until his death, Sept. 27, 1849, having served the church faithfully and successfully for more than sixteen years. His remains were interred in the yard near the house where he labored so long and where he finished his course. A plain stone marks the place where they rest. He was a plain man, making no pretensions to learning or eloquence, diffident and retiring in his manner, but sound in the faith and earnest in his delivery of the truth, seeking the honor of his Divine Master, and the peace and harmony of his people.¹ On April 1, 1850, Rev. Henry V. Jones accepted a call to the pastorate, removing from Newark, where he had charge of the First Baptist Church,

Mr. Lewis, like his predecessor, had resided in New Brunswick, but shortly after his death it was resolved to provide a parsonage within the town limits, which was accomplished by purchasing a small farm of twenty acres, and constructing thereon a new house at an expense of four thousand dollars. On the 1st of January, 1851, the meeting-house which was built in 1825 took fire and was entirely consumed, but with commendable zeal the people at once took measures to build another, and in January, 1852, a little more than a year after the destruction of the old one, a handsome new edifice, costing seven thousand five hundred dollars, was completed and dedicated, occupying the same spot which had been the site of the two former ones.

"Where . . . in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep," who were the worshipers within their walls, and their children, grandchildren, and the great-grandchildren constitute the congregation that now periodically assembles within the present meeting-house.

We find that Rev. Henry V. Jones was the eighth pastor. He remained until in March, 1856, when his health became impaired. Under his fervent ministrations greater spirituality and vigor began to pervade the church. The cause of missions received much attention, and a number of mission Sabbath-schools were established. He left the parish amid universal regret.

Rev. Christian J. Page, the ninth pastor, came from Bristol in the same year, and began his successful ministry on the 1st of October, 1856. He resigned in March, 1867, and went to Spring Valley, N. Y., in the autumn. A revival followed his advent, resulting in the addition of one hundred souls to the church within eighteen months. In September, 1862, Mr. Page, having received an appointment as chaplain in the Union army, was voted leave of absence for nine months with salary.

Rev. James F. Brown, the tenth pastor of this ancient church, became Mr. Page's successor. He came March, 1868, and is now worthily filling this honorable position. He came from Bridgeton, N. J. The various interests of the church under his care have not suffered. There has been a gradual improvement in the spiritual condition, a large number having been received. In the year 1878, Mr. Brown suffered for some time with loss of voice and general debility, was granted four months' vacation, and after some months' absence from his charge, finding himself unable to perform the pastoral duties, resigned the church, Sept. 28, 1878. After a season of supplies, the church, guided by the Spirit, with marked unanimity called Rev. J. W. Sarles, D.D., of Brooklyn, N. Y., who accepted the call and settled among them April 1, 1879.

This church is now two hundred years old, and is the second in age in the State. It has been burned down twice in its history, but immediately sprang into new life with larger and better buildings. It has had eleven preachers, which is an average of nearly eighteen years to each. Of these the longest pastorate continued fifty years, the shortest five years. The first four and the seventh died on the field, full of years and honors.

The total membership of the church in 1800 was 124; at the present time the membership is 292. The property is valued at, including the Piscataway Church, $17,500; sittings, 700.

St. James' (Protestant Episcopal) Church.—The first regular religious services in Piscataway Town according to the forms of the Church of England were performed by the Rev. Mr. Brooks, whose labors in the province commenced in 1704. He performed services in seven different places, covering ground fifty miles in extent,—at Elizabethtown, Rahway, Perth Amboy, Cheesquake, Rocky Hill, and in a congregation at Freehold near Page's. He usually visited the place once a month, and some steps were taken towards the erection of a church.

Mr. Vaughan succeeded him in similar services, and subsequently Mr. Halliday officiated once a fortnight. At this time the building of a brick church "eighty-seven feet long, twenty-three feet wide, thirteen feet high on the side walls" was undertaken, and more than £100 subscribed, a portion of which is stated to have been expended for materials, but no further progress was made. "Rev. George Keith, in his journal, mentions officiating once in Piscataway on Dec. 30, 1702;" communication to the society from the vestry, Dec. 24, 1714. The most prominent man of the congregation at that time was Mr. John Barron, one of the wardens. The other warden was Thomas Wetherel. The vestry, John Molleson, William Hodgson, Robert Webster, Charles Glover, Hopewell Hull, Henry Langstaff, Samuel Walker, John Jennings, William Olden, Samuel Royse. Subsequently, about the year 1717, by the advice of Mr. Vaughan, the frame of a timber church was put up, but the funds being exhausted it remained in an unfinished state until 1724, at which time they received occasional visits from the Rev. Mr. Skinner, of Perth Amboy, who gives as the number of communicants in that year eighteen or nineteen, and represents the congregation as increasing, the attendance being as large there as in Amboy.

For more than thirty years, and probably until his death, did Mr. Skinner discharge his duties faithfully as a missionary to this flock. In 1747 he wrote, "My circuit from the first Sunday in May is from Amboy to South River, from thence to Amboy, while the river is passable or traveling possible; and, indeed, the extremes of heat and cold render the service at sixty years of age very hard to your humble servant."

He had the satisfaction of seeing the congregation enlarge under his ministrations, stating in 1741 that his hearers generally numbered 200, and on Christmas-day, 1748, he reports the number of communicants to have been forty-five.

The parish subsequently passed into the charge of the missionaries stationed at New Brunswick, the Rev. Messrs. Wood, McKean, and Cutting, who officiated there at different periods. The latter gentleman, who commenced his labors in 1764, appears to have been of a truly catholic spirit, living at New Brunswick and associating harmoniously with all denominations, in addition to his clerical functions having under his care a few young gentlemen whom he prepared for college. His services at Piscataway Town were well attended, and he states that he was on the most friendly terms with the Baptist clergyman (Stelton), by agreement with him officiating every third Sunday in the month when that gentleman's duties called him elsewhere. He met, however, with much to discourage him; so strong were the prejudices which education and association had engendered in those composing his congregation, on his proposing to them baptism they preferred objections to sprinkling, and on offering to immerse them they declined receiving the sign of the cross upon their foreheads, and what gave him great uneasiness was the divisions existing among them respecting land titles, one of the principal men of the congregation becoming very inimical to many, who wished Mr. Cutting to exercise ecclesiastical discipline upon him. "I remonstrated to them," says the missionary; "it was a matter of law too intricate for me. In vain did I endeavor to convince them the church had no business with disputes concerning property. I offered everything in my power to mediate matters, and at last brought the principal parties to agree to leave the affair to arbitration; the rest were still violent, and became more so because I refused to do what I could not answer to God, my conscience, and society. . . . They threatened to leave the church, and the last communion some really absented themselves." This was in 1765. The next year he states with pleasure that the hostility of the parties was somewhat mollified, though he found it more difficult to appease them when their temporal interest was concerned than when any scruples arose in their minds concerning religion.

Shortly after this the Rev. Abraham Beach succeeded Mr. Cutting at New Brunswick, and officiated occasionally at Piscataway Town until the Revolution. From the re-establishment of peace up to 1830 missionaries of the Protestant Episcopal Church or clergymen from the nearest towns visited the place only two or three times a year. In 1830 the congregation was placed, along with that of Trinity Church, Woodbridge, in charge of the Rev. William Douglas, and so continued for ten years and until Mr. Douglas' removal to the West. In 1840 the Rev. Frederick Ogilby officiated occasionally; in 1841 and 1842 the Rev. Hamble J. Leacock; in 1843 and 1844 the Rev. Alfred Stubbs, of New Brunswick; in 1848 the Rev. James Chipchase; and from 1847 to 1855 the Rev. Isaac Smith were in charge of the parish or gave to it a portion of their time. The Rev. Alfred Stubbs has now charge of the church (1882).

On the 19th of June, 1835, the church was entirely destroyed by a tornado. The present neat edifice was completed in a few months after, situated on the wide avenue in the centre of the village. The Wardens, (1843) Joel Dunham, Franklin Smith, (1882) William N. Smith, Benjamin Ellimore. Vestrymen, (1843) John Kirkpatrick, Henry Langstaff, William Orme, Abraham Beach, Joseph S. Arnold, James Arnold, Jr., John T. Martin, (1882) John T. Martin, John Conaway, John E. Linstedt, and Edward Allen.

Sittings, 200; communicants, 57.

St. Luke's Episcopal Church of Metuchen.—This church is situated on the corners of Belle and Middlesex Avenues, in a beautiful part of the town of Metuchen. They first held services at the residence of H. C. Hardy, Esq., and in the year 1866 the use of the lecture-room of the Reformed Church was kindly offered, and here stated services were held, and a Sabbath-school formed. The Rev. Alfred Goldsborough, a recent graduate of the Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, was appointed their rector. But he remained but a few months, he not having much encouragement or prospect of the building of a church. The following were the first wardens: William H. C. Hardy and Nathan Robins. For some time the services of Rev. Dr. Abercrombie, of Rahway, N. J., and others supplied this weak church. With the liberality of Messrs. Robins, Thorn, Strong, and others the present St. Luke's was built, and the first services held therein June 30, 1869. The beautiful rectory on Belle Avenue was soon erected. The Rev. Stephen P. Simpson was called as rector in the year 1869; he came from Newark, N. J. The Rev. Lewis Norton is the present rector.

Sittings, 350; communicants, 65.

The St. Francis' (Roman Catholic) Church.—This neat edifice, erected in the year 1873 by the personal efforts of Rev. Fathers Rogers and Duggan, of St. Peter's Church, New Brunswick, and also the earnest labors of Rev. Father Downs, the church has been much benefited. The Rev. Father Bettoni is the present pastor, who, with the Woodbridge church, which are connected under his care. The church cost about six thousand dollars, and has some two hundred and fifty adults and children connected with the parish.

First Reformed Church of Metuchen.—This church was organized by Classes of the Reformed

Dutch Church of New Brunswick, which met in Metuchen, Dec. 27, 1857, and received some thirty or forty letters of membership from the Presbyterian Church, from this colony, from the sister-church; engaged in building their present beautiful edifice on a plot donated by D. G. Thomas, Esq., and the day of its dedication was named Aug. 5, 1858, when the venerable Rev. Dr. Bethune preached on the occasion. The first elders and deacons consisted of Albert Edgar, David G. Thomas, Smith Bloomfield, David Bloomfield, William F. Manning, Martin Compton, Henry Weston, and Charles E. Bloomfield. The first pastor, Rev. J. Bodine Thompson, was installed Feb. 15, 1859, and Nov. 6, 1866, he resigned to accept a call to the Reformed Church of Tarrytown, N. Y. Mr. Thompson was a graduate of Rutgers College and of the theological seminary of New Brunswick, and a son of Judge J. Thompson, of Readington, Somerset Co., N. J. His removal was much regretted by his congregation.

The second call to the pastorate in this church was made to Rev. Nicholas J. M. Bogart, who was installed Aug. 14, 1867; but his health caused him to resign Feb. 1, 1870. He also was a graduate of Rutgers College. In the fall of this year the church extended a call to the Rev. E. Lord from Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., who was duly installed and remained in charge, but was forced to sever his connection here on account of his continued ill health. He resigned in June, 1880, after seeing many added to this church in his ten years' pastorate. As one said, "A good man and beloved by the people."

The Rev. James Cruickshanks, from the pastorate of a church in Kenosha, Wisconsin, has now become the stated pastor. Value of church property, $10,000; sittings, 500; membership, 160; Sunday-school officers and teachers, 15; scholars, 100.

Presbyterian Church of Metuchen.—Some time during Rev. Mr. Whitaker's administration as pastor of the Woodbridge Presbyterian Church, about 1763, a portion of the inhabitants residing in the southern part of the township (Metuchen) formed a separate congregation, subsequently known as the Second Presbyterian Church of Woodbridge, and eventually as the Presbyterian Church at Metuchen.¹ In 1790 a separation was effected from the Woodbridge Church after nearly thirty years of united action. Rev. Azel Roe officiated during this time alternately in the two congregations very acceptably, and continued among them during the Revolution.

The church in Metuchen at this time must have been rather a rude structure. By the kindness of Mr. Hampton we were shown the place where it stood upon the upper end of Main Street, in the old burial-ground, next to Mr. Vanderhoven's lot or residence.

The first official record is dated June 2, 1784.

There were no trustees for the church appointed, but collectors were named for the purpose of looking after the finances of the church and to pay the amounts to their pastor, Rev. Mr. Roe. There were sixty-four seats up- and down-stairs, with one aisle, as was common in those days in most of the churches. A high pulpit with sounding-board.² We well remember these early churches without chimneys built, as no stoves were used, only the little tin foot-stove that had a cup to hold a coal of fire, which was generally supplied by the near neighbor. The size of this church was twenty-five by thirty-six feet.

This church was incorporated in the year 1787 as the Second Church of Woodbridge. The following trustees were elected, they being the first: Benjamin Manning, John Conger, John Ross, Ebenezer Ford, Ellis Ayers, Timothy Bloomfield, Robert Ross.

In 1792, after an extensive revival of religion, when large additions were made to the church, it was decided to enlarge this meeting-house by adding some fifteen feet, building of chimneys, and having its roof changed (perhaps new shingled), some £300 was expended. Mr. Jonathan Freeman was empowered to do the work.

Mr. James Manning was chosen a ruling elder April 15, 1793. Rev. Mr. Roe's services were retained for one-third of the time authorized by the Presbytery of New York, which met at Orange, May 9, 1793. "But another account says that the church dissolved their connection with Woodbridge, and Rev. Mr. Roe was not supplying the congregation." He must have been very old; he remained with the First Church, Woodbridge, until his death, in 1818.

In the year 1794 a call was made to Rev. Henry Cook, of Morris County, at a yearly salary of £120, and he accepted the charge of the Metuchen Church, May 1, 1794.

The parsonage was purchased in 1795 for £200, and was where Mr. Ellis F. Ayers lived. In the year 1805 the salary of the pastor, Rev. Mr. Cook, was raised to $400, and in 1807 the parsonage grounds was enlarged by an addition of a small lot, and also more land was added to the burial-ground.

In the year 1813, Lewis Thornal and Richard Ross were made the elders. In 1814, Robert Ross, Jr., and David Kelley were appointed as chorists, and perhaps Mr. William Lover was also appointed, as he was a singing-master and taught singing-schools in the neighborhood.

In 1824 the pastor, Rev. Mr. Cook, died at the age of fifty-five, and after a pastorate of thirty years. It was a great loss to this church. He was buried in the old burial-ground, and a stone with a suitable inscription placed over the grave. An extensive revival visited this church in 1818, when over one hundred were added to its communion. The Rev. Holloway Whitfield Hunt received a unanimous call at a salary of four hundred dollars with parsonage, and which he accepted and was installed April 29, 1828. He married a Miss Henrietta Mundy, of this place. He was born at Kingwood, Hunterdon Co., N. J., March 31, 1800. He was the son of Rev. Gardiner A. and Ruth Page Hunt, afterwards of Harmony, N. J. During his pastorate extensive ingatherings to the church occurred, and in 1834 a new church was in contemplation forty by sixty. Messrs. Stelle Manning, William M. Ross, and many others were its prime movers. It was finished and dedicated Jan. 30, 1836. Mr. Hunt, after a useful term of years, retired from the church, and for several months there was a vacancy, when Rev. Peter H. Burghardt was called. He accepted and was installed Nov. 30, 1847, and his pastorate continued until June 5, 1850.

In the fall the Rev. Robert J. Finley accepted a call to this church, and was installed on the 14th of November, 1850. He was the son of Rev. Dr. Finley. He had studied law, and soon after entered upon its practice in the city of Cincinnati. But after a while he relinquished it for the ministry, and after laboring for some years in the South and having acted as the agent of the American Colonization Society, in 1850 he settled over this church, where he preached acceptably until October, 1857. During that time the church was enlarged to its present size. It may be said justly that Mr. Finley was a useful and honest Christian clergyman, and this church parted with him with regret; many were added to the church during his pastorate. He died at Talladega, Ala., July 2, 1860, where he had the charge of the Presbyterian Institute.

The Rev. Gardner S. Plumley, of New York City, received a call in January, 1858, which he accepted, and on April 28, 1858, he was installed as pastor. He was born at Washington, D. C., and attended Yale College, where he graduated in 1850, also at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and in the year 1855 was pastor of the Bloomingdale Church in New York. "Within the last few years the property of the church has been improved. A spire was erected in 1863, and a bell was purchased in 1865."¹

In 1876, Rev. Mr. Plumley resigned the pastorate, after a number of years of great usefulness in this church.

Rev. James Gilbert Mason accepted a unanimous call as pastor to this church, which had been supplied for several months after Dr. Plumley's resignation. He was installed April 24, 1877. He was born at the town of Jonesborough, East Tennessee, attended Williams College, was pastor of the North Church at Washington City, D. C.

In connection with this church there is a flourishing Sabbath-school, and also four mission schools, under the care of the officers of the church. The number of sittings is seven hundred and fifty, communicants two hundred and seventy-five. The following are the present elders: Cornelius Voorhees, William C. Martin, John J. Clarkson, Augustus Blackford, Francis Grimstead, Robert Bruce Crowell, Benajah M. Kelly, James A. Grimstead.

Burial-Places.—Piscataway and Stelton burial-grounds are among the oldest places of interment in the township. Here for nearly two hundred years has lain the dust of the pioneers. Among the older monuments is that of George Drake's wife, Elizabeth, who was buried in 1768 at the age of fifty-six, and has the following flattering testimonial upon her tombstone:

"Frugal like Martha as a wife,
And lived Mary's godly life."

There is Edward Griffith's grave. He died March 23, 1813, aged seventy-five years. Upon the stone we read these words: "He worthily fulfilled the office of Deacon in this church [Baptist] near 50 years." Ephraim Martin's death occurred in his seventy-third year, on the 28th day of February, 1806. William Drake's wife, Hannah, sleeps near at hand, buried in March, 1797, in the forty-first year of her age. Fitz Randolph Drake died Oct. 6, 1791, aged seventy-five, and his body is slumbering here. Rev. Edmund Dunham, Capt. Andrew Drake, Elizabeth Sutton, and many of the other old-time people are buried here.

There are a few private farm burial-lots, but most of the stones have been removed and many of the graves have been leveled even with the soil.

METUCHEN OLD AND NEW GRAVEYARDS.—The old venerable graveyard on the line of the railroad at Metuchen contains many moss-covered headstones of the pioneers and their descendants for many generations:

Henry Allen died April 10, 1783, in ye age of 43.
Reuben Ayres died March 22, 1793, in his 63d year.
Timothy Bloomfield died January 18, 1813, in his 74th year.
Capt. Smith Bloomfield washed ashore from schooner "Lafayette" while on a voyage to the Pacific Ocean, September 26, 1826, in his 27th year.
David Compton died May 7, 1789, aged 67 years.
Doctor John Cool died August 14, 1823, aged 49 years.
John Campbell died October 15, 1731, aged 73 years. This monument is of rough blue slate, with quaint inscriptions that are hard now to decipher.
Neil Campbell died October 16, 1777, in his 43d year.
Richard Carmon died December 22, 1768, in his 71st year, and his son (Richard, Jr.) died May 4, 1769, in his 36th year.
Lewis Evens died Oct. 25, 1776, in his 32d year.
James Eddy died August 19, 1792, in his 82d year.
Ebenezer Ford died July 15, 1797, in his 58th year.
James Flatt died Aug. 8, 1800.
Ellis Freeman died Feb. 11, 1773.
John Freeman died 1764.
Joseph Freeman died March 12, 1797.
Doctor Matthias Freeman died Sept. 23, 1831, in his 57th year.
Dr. Melancthon Freeman died Nov. 11, 1806, in his 60th year.
David and Phoebe Goodfellow died September, 1789.
Daniel Hampton died April 15, 1795, aged 50 years.
Peter Knapps died March 17, 1760, aged 50 years.
Samuel Kelly died November 22, 1780, in his 63d year.
Rachel Laforge died July 26, 1801, aged 19 years.
Capt. Leonard died May 9, 1803, in his 50th year. He served during the Revolutionary war, doing valiant service.

Nathaniel Leonard, formerly of Huntingdon County, died Sept. 11, 1797, aged 72 years.

Mr. Eliakim Martin died May 18, 1782, in his 69th year.

James Martin died May 16, 1776, in his 67th year.

John Morris died January 2, 1788, in his 45th year.

Daniel McGregor died October 27, 1806, aged 59 years. "He donated the sum of $395 to the church."

Capt. William Manning died Sept. 26, 1814, in his 75th year. "He was eminently useful in life, and at his death left a donation of $700 for the support of the Gospel in this church."

Dr. Robinson Munday died May 26, 1833, aged 22 years.

Jonathau Rowland, born June 10, 1768, died May 20, 1827.

Matilda Stivers died April 15, 1807, in his 38th year.

Thomas Streamback died Feb. 11, 1812, in his 23d year.

Also are buried here at an early date the Thomals, Terrys, Thatcher, Tappin, Thicksion, Thorp, Talmage, Warren, Vanderbergh, Voorhees, Van Sickin, Vanderhoover, Taylor, Vermule, Watson, Wales, Wooding, and Wilson.

In the new cemetery between the church and parsonage lie interred many names represented in the old colonial ground, such as the families of Edgar, Wilson, Taylor, Vanderhooven, Manning, Fitz Randolph, Thomal, Tappen, Thorp, Tabon, Thomas, Terry, Schuerman, Throckmartin, Sofield, Savidge, Sherwood, Stivers, Soaper, Noe, Potter, Nicholas, Mundy, Frazee, Ayres, Acken, Allward, Bloomfield, Bloodgood, McKnight, Clark, Crowell, Compton, Campbell, Crow, Clarkson, Conger, Cook, Kelly, Daniels, Evens, Eddy, Fourat, Freeman, Foster, Griffing, Hampton, Hall, Hull, Humpries, Hunt, Martin, Morris, and many others.

Villages and Hamlets.—BONHAMTON, named after Nicholas Bonham, one of the first settlers of this part of Middlesex County, having become a freeholder in 1682-83, and so recorded as owner of lands by allotment. This is one of the most ancient settlements in the county.

The following is an extract from the letter of an officer while at camp, and dated Bonhamton, April 15, 1877:

"A detachment under the command of Capt. Alexander Paterson, of the Pennsylvania Twelfth Regiment, commanded by Col. Cook, attacked the Fiquet Guard of the Enemy at 2 o'clock this morning, about four hundred yards from Bonhamton, and after a short but obstinate engagement the whole of the guard, twenty-five in number, were either killed or taken prisoners. Lieut. Frazier of the Seventy-first Regiment was killed on the spot. The enemy, though advantageously posted, did not attempt to support their guard, but retired with precipitation to their works. Our officers and soldiers behaved with the greatest coolness and courage on this occasion. Their conduct would do honor to the best disciplined troops. We had Lieuts. McAlharton and Reilly, of Col. Cook's Regiment, wounded not mortally."

We also give a second extract from the same letter:

"Post near Bonhamton, May 11, 1777, says, 'I have the pleasure to inform you that yesterday part of Gen. Stevens' division attacked the Royal Highlanders and six companies of light infantry. It was a bold enterprise, they being posted within two miles of Bonhamton and about the same distance from Brunswick. The action continued about one hour and half. The Continental troops behaved well and drove in the pickets at Bonhamton, attacked and drove the Highlanders out of a wood they had taken possession of near to Piscataway Town. The enemy were reinforced but were again compelled to give away. They were reinforced a second time, when upon the consideration of our situation with respect to the enemy's different posts (at Brunswick, Raritan Landing, and Bonhamton) it was judged advisable to retire.

The retreat was made in excellent order, and our loss is inconsiderable. I congratulate you on this advantage obtained over the enemy's best troops. The Highlanders, obstinately brave, were too proud to surrender, which cost many of them dear."

Bonhamtown is five miles northeast of New Brunswick, on the turnpike road leading to Woodbridge, from which it is distant six miles. It contains a few dwellings, store, tavern, and district school-house No. 18, and a Union Chapel. It is mostly a farming community. There are also a number who are engaged in manufacture of bricks and fire-clay. A small branch railroad, called the Clay Company's, runs from this town to the Raritan River, where vessels are loaded.

FORD'S CORNER and SAND HILLS, small settlements, are just on the line of Woodbridge township. The Amboy Railroad branches pass through. The hamlet contains a store and school-house. Highland Park, as it is called, is situated on the Raritan River, in the southerly part of the township and opposite the city of New Brunswick. It is a desirable location for suburban residences, and already contains many handsome mansions, with fine grounds, drives, and other accessories.

The village (or town) of PISCATAWAY is one of the earliest of settlements, dating back to 1668. In modern times it has been nearly described as "three miles northeast from New Brunswick, and one mile from the Raritan River, on the turnpike road from New Brunswick to Woodbridge, containing an Episcopal Church, a Baptist Church, a store, and some ten or twelve dwellings in a tolerably fertile country. This was an old Indian village, and is remarkable for having been the seat of justice for Middlesex and Somerset Counties as early as 1683. At that period the courts were holden sometimes at this place and sometimes at Woodbridge."

METUCHEN.—The following account of this village we find, with many other historical records of the olden times, in Rev. Joseph W. Dally's very interesting story of a New Jersey township: Metuchen begins to figure in the records in 1701. John Compton was chosen surveyor of the highways in "Matuching for that year." Metuchen, an Indian chief, tradition declares to have inhabited that section between 1620 and 1700. It is asserted that the warrior is buried on a farm near the village. Metuchen is therefore of Indian etymology, the meaning of which is "high hill;" and local authority says that it was a descriptive name given by the tribe of Raritans because of the undulating character of the country. Hence the chief who held sway there was called Metuchen, chief of the rolling land.¹

In the freeholders' meeting, held Jan. 9, 1724, Justice Hude presiding, it was voted that certain pieces of lands should lie perpetually common, among which were these: "A plot at Metuchen adjoining the southwest corner of Israel Thomel's land; one lying before Moses Rolph's door (John Allen's house-lot forming the rear boundary); and one, as the clerk describes it, 'on the end of Strawberry Hill, next the town, between the road that leads to Amboy and the dwelling-house of Ephraim Andrews, deceased.'" These commons were to be devoted to "publique uses" only, such as "the building of school-houses, market-places, etc."

Soon after the British camp was formed at Bonhamton, a Mr. Compton, grandfather of Henry Compton, was visited by the British, who had learned that two of his sons were serving in the Continental army, and telling him to pack up his bed and furniture, gave him the old gray horse and a wagon and sent him away. They then burned his house and out-buildings and stole his six horses, thirty head of cattle, and fifty sheep. Mr. Compton's dwelling stood by the brook between Metuchen and Bonhamton. The camp at the latter place was composed of five British regiments. The officers occupied the house now the dwelling of Benjamin Tappin, owned at the time by the grandfather of Jerome Ross.

The town of Metuchen is situated nearly in the centre of Raritan township. The Pennsylvania Railroad has there stations, and runs continuous trains to and from New York and the Eastern and Western cities, making this a desirable point for residents doing business in the adjacent cities of New Brunswick, Newark, and New York, and there are some of the finest villas that have been built within a few years scattered along these beautiful avenues. There are five churches, post-office, hotel, a number of stores, including bakery, confectionery, butcher- and carpenter-shops. School District No. 15 have built a neat academy, situated on Middlesex Avenue near the terminus of Union Avenue. Prospect Hill, a very peculiar elevation, in nearly a circular form, and strongly resembling many of the Indian mounds of the West, the summit of which commands a fine view of the adjacent country.

The Eastern and Amboy Railroad (a branch of the Lehigh Valley route) has regular connection with this road at the Water Tanks, where passengers change cars for the Amboy and Lehigh Valley Railroad, then passing on to the depot at Metuchen, where passengers can change for New Brunswick and Philadelphia, or continue in same train to Elizabeth, Newark, and New York. This town has so many desirable points for the convenience of the residents that in a few years the prospects are that it will double its population.

Post-Offices.—It is said that a post-office was first established in 1832 in Metuchen by one Lewis Thomas, for nearly nine years, when Mr. George B. Stelle was then the postmaster. For many years since the office had been established in Upper Metuchen, and after its removal to near the centre or lower part of the town near the depot the following gentlemen have held the position as postmaster:

July 23, 1841, R. R. Freeman, and after holding it for nearly four years, in 1845 Mr. Ezekiel Merritt was placed in charge. The following have held the position: Freeman Edgar, Ezekiel Merritt, Thomas Van Sicken, 1853; J. J. Clarkson, I. E. Van Geisen, and the present postmaster, Albert Acken. The Stelton post-office has been established but a few years. Joseph France, 1870-71; Augustus Steele, postmaster, 1873-82.

NEW DURHAM, situated just on the border of this township and Piscataway, is a hamlet composed of a number of families and a school-house.

There are a number of smaller settlements or clusters of houses, school-houses in other parts of the township.

MENLO PARK, situated on the Pennsylvania Railroad, is a beautiful location on high ground. It has its post-office, "Edison Electric Light Manufactory," and a copper-mine.

NEW DOVER, a small settlement a short distance from Metuchen, has one store, a church, school-house, and post-office.

STELTON is a growing village on the line of Pennsylvania Railroad, about four miles from New Brunswick. It has a church, school-house, store, and post-office. Its appearance is neat; the dwellings in good taste; streets laid out with shade-trees; the town is surrounded by a farming community. There is a large number by the name of Stelle, who were first settlers here in 1668, and from which the village received its name.

Manufacturing Interests.—Some of the finest fire-clays, similar to that in Woodbridge township, which is of great value and manufactured at different points in Raritan township.

The Raritan Ridge Clay Company,—Mrs. Augustine Campbell who is treasurer,—miners and shippers of clay, sand, and kaolin. Their banks and docks are on the north shore of the Raritan River.

A. M. Mervin, manufacturer of building-brick on the Raritan River near Ford's Corner.

At Bonhamton and other points clay has been mined. At Menlo Park a copper-mine has lately been worked. Here are the electric light factories of Thomas A. Edison.

There is water-power sufficient in this township for all needed purposes of use in manufacturing and steam-power. The Pennsylvania Road gives all facilities required. Their track passes through this township east and west, while the Lehigh Valley, passing through from Easton and the coal-fields to Metuchen, gives all needed fuel to the factories and private dwellings. It is said that over two hundred and fifty thousand tons pass through this town to Perth Amboy every year.

Copper-Mines.—About the year 1784 a rich copper-mine was discovered nearly on the line of this and Woodbridge townships. It is just a short distance from Menlo Park and near the track of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Mr. Ellis Ayres can yet remember seeing it when being worked, and he says that plates of native copper were taken from between the seams of the rocks two feet wide by six feet long. He says they had arrangements for hoisting up the water by mule-power, the mule backing and lowering a tub, which would fill at the bottom and be hoisted out again, just as horses are now used in unloading vessels at the present time. But the shafts and drifts filled so fast with water that the miners became discouraged on being "drowned out," and Mr. Edison, the electric light inventor, recently obtained the property for prospecting, and has commenced to work them. He has opened the shaft, and found it to curve with the hill as a convex, keeping eighteen or twenty feet from the surface, and extending three hundred feet or more till it again came out on the other side of the hill. They also discovered a shaft which had also been worked before. Mr. Edison instantly set a force to work, and after digging almost fifteen feet down at the spot they came to the cross-timbers which had been laid across and covered up the old shaft. Strange to say, the chestnut timbers were in good preservation. A steam-engine had been set to work to pump out the water, and soon had it clear one hundred and twenty feet down. When forty feet were cleared they came to a drift which crossed the shaft at right angles and went both ways, in one direction running into the first drift above alluded to. It was in these drifts the ancient miners worked. At one hundred and twenty feet down the drift is clear and has not yet been followed to its endways, going like the other drift both ways from the bottom of the shaft.

It was at this bottom that a wheelbarrow was found of very primitive construction, and some homemade picks and shovels, just as left by the workmen. They were evidently the work of blacksmiths of the period, and not like the factory-made shovels and picks of to-day. The shovels had nearly corroded away, however, but the wooden handles were as sound as ever. The wheelbarrow also was in a good state of preservation. Mr. Edison values these relics very highly, and has kept them all.

In pumping out the water from the main shaft, ladders, formed of chestnut, with split chestnut saplings for the rungs, were found leading down entirely to the bottom of the big shaft in a perfect state of preservation. There were six or seven of these ladders, and there must be a preservative quality in the water of this mine, or it would not so well have kept these saplings.

As these mines must have filled rapidly with water, and steam had not been invented at the early time these mines were worked, may have been the cause of their desertion, leaving these tools behind them.

Mr. Edison expects to secure the copper enough needed in his factory near by, and it is somewhat strange that so little is known of the early workers. No traditions have been remembered save by an old resident, Mr. Ellis F. Ayres, and his memory in locating the site of the old shaft. It may probably be that his ancestors may have told him about the mines, as they were not worked in his memory.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

ISRAEL THORNAL.

The origin of this family in this country is thought to be Scotch-Irish. Israel Thornal, the fourth generation from the present Israel, came to Woodbridge, N. J., in the second quarter of the seventeenth century. Little is known of him. His son Benjamin settled in what was then Woodbridge, now Raritan township, near the site of the present Thornal homestead. Benjamin had one son, named Israel, of whom we have some account.

In the war of 1776 a detachment of British troops stationed at Perth Amboy came to the residence of Benjamin Thornal and took him and his son Israel prisoners. At the same time they drove from the farm twenty-seven head of cattle. The prisoners were taken to New York City, to what was then known as the "Sugar-House." Benjamin died in prison. His son was exchanged and returned home, became a large and prosperous farmer, and a prominent man in the township. There is a record of his renting a pew in the Presbyterian Church in Metuchen, June 2, 1784. His children were Louis, Ephraim, Benjamin, Manning, Margaret, Betsey, Mary, and Lockie.

Manning, the youngest son, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born May 21, 1793, and died Jan. 19, 1868. When sixteen years of age he moved to Uniontown, and there spent five years, learning the trade of a hatter. On reaching his twenty-first year he came home to Woodbridge, and began farming with his father. He was married, June 11, 1816, to Deliverance Freeman, who was born April 18, 1793, and died June 23, 1858. The issue of this marriage was eleven children,—Sarah F., born Feb. 3, 1817; William, Feb. 25, 1818; Eliza E., Nov. 15, 1819; Israel, Aug. 22, 1821; Arold F., Feb. 13, 1823; Margaret R., Nov. 16, 1824 (died in infancy); Benjamin C., Jan. 3, 1827; Rachel A., June 20, 1828; Margaret R., 1831; Mary J., May 18, 1833; Joanna, Oct. 31, 1836.

Israel, the subject of our sketch, is the fourth generation in regular descent having the Thornal name who has owned and lived upon the place he now occupies. While a boy he attended the district school and worked on the farm, as was the custom of those times. After finishing his studies at school he turned his whole attention to farming, and had sole charge of the farm for eight or ten years before his father's death. By his will his father gave him the farm, and made him sole executor of the estate. His Aunt Lockie made her home with him. She died April 25, 1878, aged eighty-six. She used to relate many interesting incidents of the dark days of the Revolution, as told by her father and his friends.

ISRAEL THORNAL.

Israel Thornal was married, April 11, 1872, to Georgie Williams, who was born June 1, 1836. The children of this marriage are Dillie F., born Aug. 13, 1873; Georgie F., Oct. 9, 1874; Manning, Feb. 9, 1877.

Mr. Thornal united with the Presbyterian Church of Metuchen in the spring of 1862, and has been a member of the board of trustees of that church for the last ten years. He has a large, well-cultivated farm and a pleasant home. He has been a life-long Democrat, and although not taking an active part in politics he has repeatedly refused to accept office. He is now chairman of the town committee. Mr. Thornal is a gentleman well thought of in his township, and is a good representative of the careful, thrifty, progressive farmer. He has always lived on the Thornal homestead.

WILLIAM T. EDGAR.

The paternal grandfather of the subject of this sketch came from Scotland and settled in Woodbridge, N. J. He was the father of twelve children. Albert, the third son, was the father of the subject of our sketch, and started life in Woodbridge as a mason, subsequently became a farmer. In the last days of his declining years he retired from business on a competency won by industry and good management. Mr. Edgar was highly respected by the people of his native town. He died in Woodbridge in 1878, aged seventy-four. He was married three times. His first wife was Miss Martha Laforge, by whom he had one child. For his second wife he married Susan Tappin, who bore him four children. His third wife, who still survives him, was Emiline Tappin.

William T. Edgar, the subject of this sketch, was the second child of Albert and Susan Edgar, and was born Jan. 17, 1847. He attended school at Bonhamton. After leaving school he went to work on a farm. In 1863 Mr. Edgar's patriotism called him to shoulder his musket in defense of our nation's honor and our nation's life. He enlisted Feb. 15, 1863, and remained until peace was proclaimed. After being "mustered out" he returned to his home in Raritan township and began farming. Soon after he opened a clay bank, and has been in the clay business ever since. He recently purchased the Burgen estate, and has opened and is working a fine bank of good terracotta clay. There seems to be a large quantity of this clay on the farm. He is building a good house on the place, and expects to move there as soon as the building is completed.

Mr. Edgar was married in 1870.

WILLIAM H. CALLARD.

William Callard, the father of the subject of this sketch, emigrated from England in 1819, and settled in Piscataway township, N. J., near where his son, William H. Callard, now lives. He was married Aug. 31, 1819, to Miss Harriet Smith, of Bound Brook, N. J. Two sons were born unto them, viz., William Henry, born March 26, 1834, and George S., born Oct. 25, 1839.

Mr. and Mrs. Callard were hard-working, frugal people, and by their united industry and frugality became possessed of a considerable property. Mr. Callard died April 19, 1860. His wife still survives him. She lives with her son, William Henry, to whom his father left his farm.

George S. died Oct. 6, 1861; William H. was married Nov. 28, 1860, to Miss Sarah E. Hodge, of Bound Brook, N. J. Miss Hodge was born Sept. 9, 1835.

The children of this marriage were Harriet E., born March 7, 1862; George S., Feb. 24, 1864; Lillie, July 25, 1866; William H., Dec. 29, 1868; Ella Adelia, Jan. 3, 1872; De Witt, June 14, 1874; Mary Eugenia, April 17, 1877. Harriet was married to Mr. Harry Copperthwaite, of New York, by the Rev. J. W. Searles, in the Baptist Church at Stelton, Oct. 27, 1880.

Mr. Callard has added to the homestead, so that the farm is much larger than when it came into his possession. Mr. Callard's residence is situated on the north bank of the Raritan River, with a fine view of the river.

He has terra-cotta clay of a superior quality and a large quantity of the best fire-sand on his farm.

Banks have recently been opened, from which terra-cotta clay and fire-sand are shipped. He rents the clay banks and conducts his farm himself.

SAYREVILLE.¹

Situation and Boundaries.—Sayreville is situated in the eastern portion of Middlesex County, a little north of the centre, and is the last civil derivation to date from the township of South Amboy. It is very irregular in form, and is bounded as follows: North by Raritan, Woodbridge, and South Amboy, east by Raritan Bay and Madison, south by Madison, and west by East Brunswick. Its area is twelve hundred and forty acres. The population in 1880 was about nineteen hundred.

Natural Features.—South River flows along the entire western border of Sayreville, and Raritan River and Bay wash its northern boundary. Chees-quake Creek flows along the east side to its junction with Raritan Bay. Deep Run, near its mouth, crosses the extreme southern point of the township, and Tenant's Creek crosses a little farther north. Along the northern, eastern, and western sides are several small streams tributary to Raritan River and Bay, Chees-quake Creek, and South River.

The surface is mostly low and level, though very slightly rolling in the portion adjacent to Madison. Much of it is covered with a sparse growth of timber, such varieties being represented as are indigenous to the soil of Middlesex County bordering the rivers, oak and cedar predominating.

The soil is sandy, and abounds in an excellent quality of clay, much of which has been shipped to various parts of the country, some of it having been early employed in the manufacture of delftware in Jersey City, and in the fabrication of china at Trenton and Philadelphia, large quantities now being used within the township in the manufacture of common and fire-brick.

The old Camden and Amboy Railroad traverses the township in a nearly north-and-south course, the nearest stations being at South Amboy and Old Bridge, in South Amboy and East Brunswick townships respectively. The principal highways crossing Sayreville are the roads from South Amboy to Washington, and from South Amboy to Old Bridge, the latter dividing Sayreville and Madison for some distance.

In 1880 the taxable valuation of real and personal property in this township was $287,000. The amount of real estate was $232,000; the amount of personal property, $82,000. The polls numbered 314. The rate of taxation for specified purposes was as follows: State, .20 per $100; county, .60 per $100; poor, .38 per $100; ways and means, .10 per $100; roads, .22 per $100; schools, $1.50 and $1.90 per $100, in different districts. The amount of tax ordered to be raised was $5589.72. The expenditures during the year closed at date of statement were as follows: For State purposes, $551; for county purposes, $1678; for schools, $474.64; for the poor, $1200; for ways and means, $300; for roads, $700.

As an agricultural township Sayreville does not take high rank, most of its surface being either covered with timber or devoted to the clay and sand trade and brick manufacture. The extreme western portion is rendered an island, and to a degree isolated from the remainder of the township, by the old Washington ship canal connecting South River and the Raritan.

Settlement.—Land in Sayreville township adjoining the South and Raritan Rivers was taken up as early as 1683 to 1686 (the date of John Reid's map of the Raritan River and the regions north and south of it) by the following-named persons: G. L. (probably G. Lawry, an extensive land-owner in the vicinity), 850 acres, including 550 acres embraced in the "Roundabout Meadows," bounded east and north by the South and Raritan Rivers respectively at their confluence; P. Sonman's two lots of 200 and 300 acres respectively; T. Rudyard, 300 acres; A. Galloway and W. Gerard, 300 acres; Thomas Robison, 300 acres. These allotments were narrow lots extending north and south and bordering on the Raritan. Farther east several other lots were laid out which had not been taken up at the time Reid's survey was made. At a point which must have been nearly opposite the borough or town of Washington, East Brunswick, D. Violent and G. Gordon had taken up two long and narrow lots, extending east from the South River, containing 100 and 150 acres respectively. Portions of two tracts of 300 acres and 200 acres each, also then the property of "G. L.," and of a tract of 600 acres indicated on the map as belonging to R. Townley, and three tracts of 100, 150, and 180 acres each, designated as the property of "I. L.," "W. L.," and "N. L." respectively, were undoubtedly within the present boundaries of Sayreville.

None of these land-owners were ever residents of the township, and none of their descendants are known to have since lived within its borders. Doubtless the land was bought cheaply, as large tracts of land have been bought in all new countries, with the idea that money would be made upon their probable subsequent increase in value. Their commercial value, as now estimated, was probably not considered, for the basis upon which it is computed must have been then undreamed of. A knowledge of the availability to manufacturing purposes of the extensive beds of sand and fire-clay with which these lands abound is referred to. Or, if the character of the soil was known, it is improbable that at that remote date the purchasers had any prophetic advice of the immense demand for these materials which has been developed by a subsequent growth of interests of which they must have had no conception at that time.

It is probable that settlement began in Sayreville as early as 1770, and it is possible some one may have located there prior to that time. After it had begun it was slow, and until the brick and clay industries brought numerous laboring men within its borders the township was sparsely inhabited. There was no town of any size near it that was not isolated by water. The land was low and sandy, and not well adapted to agriculture. Surely there was little to attract the pioneers.

It is believed that not far from the date above mentioned Elijah Disbrow made an opening in the forest about midway between the site of the present Sayreville and Washington bridge and the locality of the Burt's Creek settlement. He had two sons, Andrew and Stacy, who inherited their father's property and lived and died there. Both married. The wife of Stacy was a Miss Applegate, who survives him, aged about ninety-five. The children of Stacy Disbrow were named Gamaliel, William, Elijah, Henrietta, Maria, Sarah, Margaret, and Eliza.

Roundabout Landing, as a landing on the projecting point of land between South River and the Raritan has come to be known, was the place selected by Ebenezer Price for his future home. He was one of the earliest settlers in the township, and his house stood within the present boundaries of Wood's brickyard. It was built there considerably earlier than 1800, and its builder has been dead many years. Many of his descendants are living in Middlesex County and elsewhere. Xerxes, Ebenezer, and Maria were the names of his children.

Xerxes Price married Nancy, daughter of Francis Letts, and located on land near his father. His children were George, John, and a daughter who became the wife of Capt. Isaac Fauratt; George married and removed to New Brunswick, where he is yet living; John went to the West.

On a portion of the Morgan estate, near the mouth of Cheesquake Creek, the father of Gen. James Morgan was a very early resident. Some of his descendants are well-known citizens of South Amboy.

For some time Xerxes Price was engaged in the manufacture of pottery in Sayreville township, and he was well known to the business men of the vicinity during his active career. His death was a sad one, and his suicide by hanging was for many years the topic of occasional conversations among his acquaintances.

Ebenezer Price married and, living near his father, reared a family, two of whom, Abial and Abraham, are residents of Washington, East Brunswick. The former married a daughter of Henry Smith, a prominent hotel-keeper of New Brunswick, the latter a Miss Connet.

The daughter, Maria, married Henry French, who built a tavern at Roundabout at an early date, and kept it until about 1820, selling it to a man named Brookfield, who sold it and the land about it to James Wood in 1851. Since then it has been at times occupied as a tenement-house, but is now in an advanced stage of dilapidation. This hostelry was for years a favorite resort of the watermen who stopped at Roundabout Landing, and Mrs. French, who is said to have been a woman more than ordinarily prepossessing in appearance and uncommonly attractive in her manners and conversation, was known far and near by the appellation of the "handsome landlady."

The pioneer on the south side of the road at the end of the bridge between Sayreville and Washington was Christopher Van Deventer, who purchased a good-sized farm there and took up his residence on it at an early day. His family was large and became well known and respected. The names of the sons were Isaac, Peter, Abraham, John, Jacob, and Zenas.

Isaac Van Deventer married into the Ackerman family, was a sloop-owner and captain and a farmer, and lived in East Brunswick. His sons were Abraham, Garline, and Charles. Abraham married, and for a time lived on a portion of his father's property, but subsequently removed from the township. Garline is living on the homestead. Charles lives in East Brunswick. Isaac also had three daughters. Of these, Jane married Samuel Martin, of Piscataway.

Peter Van Deventer also came into possession of part of his father's original farm, and lived on it until his death. His family was large. Three of his sons were named Freeland, Peter, and Dean, the latter receiving as a Christian name the surname of his mother's family.

Another of the sons of Christopher Van Deventer who inherited a portion of his land was Abraham, who lived upon the property and reared a family, of which Warren, Watson, and others were members. John Van Deventer never married. He died while en voyage by water from Philadelphia, about twenty years ago. Jacob Van Deventer married a daughter of David Provost, and took up his residence in Madison. Two sons of his were named Jacob and Zenas.

Zenas Van Deventer, son of Christopher, espoused Julia Ann Martin, daughter of Samuel Martin. Both he and his wife are dead, leaving no issue. Tina Van Deventer, Christopher's daughter, married twice, the last time James Ivins, and lived for a while on the old Taylor place, opposite the Van Deventer homestead. At his death Christopher Van Deventer owned considerable land, which was divided among his children. Most of his sons bought more, and the family became known as quite extensive land-owners. The old homestead was sold by Abraham to Henry F. Worthington, who for some years carried on an extensive brick manufactory there.

An early owner of the Taylor farm, on the opposite side of the road from the Van Deventer place, was Robert Montgomery, a wealthy gentleman of Allentown, N. J., who was a non-resident in Sayreville, and probably acquired the property in some business transaction with a former owner. Later it came into the possession of Joseph M. Taylor, who sold a part of it to Robert L. Serviss and John Tuttle about 1853. The latter replaced the old house by a new one of more modern architecture, turning the land into a brick-yard. Subsequently the house was removed to another portion of the farm. Some years ago this brick-yard was sold to William Fisher, who now occupies the house. The other portion of the original farm is now the residence of a married daughter of Peter Fisher.

Near the Elijah Disbrow farm, about half-way from the Sayreville and Washington bridge to Burt's Creek, Francis Letts was an early resident, and it is not improbable that his father was there before him. He married Polly Van Deventer, and their children were Isaac and Nancy Letts, who married a Miss Hoffman and Xerxes Price respectively. Isaac succeeded to the farm of his father, and had a numerous family.

Benjamin Peterson, a native of New Egypt, N. J., settled in Sayreville in 1810, and purchased a tract of land and engaged in farming, remaining there until his death in 1840. He had seven sons and six daughters. The brothers, with two exceptions, were watermen, and died quite young. One of the daughters died in infancy. The others lived to a ripe old age. James Peterson, son of Benjamin, is an aged and respected resident of Washington, in East Brunswick.

Who was the first settler in Sayreville of the name of James is not now ascertainable. Thomas James, a native of the soil, was living two miles from South Amboy, on the road to Washington, early in the present century. Lawrence and Gamaliel were his sons. Lawrence died unmarried; Gamaliel married and had a family of children, some of whom are among the residents of South Amboy.

On the road which was afterwards converted into the Bordentown turnpike, three miles from South Amboy, James Applegate was living eighty years ago. His sons were James and Lewis. James owned and kept a tavern on what is now known as the "Poor-house Farm," which later became the property of South Amboy township. This tavern was a stopping-place for stages in the days when staging was brisk, and was a fairly-conditioned and kept wayside inn. James Applegate, the landlord, died there about fifty years ago. He had sons named James and William Applegate.

A property at Burt's Creek was early owned by two brothers named Bennett and resident upon Long Island, but was bought by other parties who operated clay banks upon it. Another property in the same neighborhood was purchased fifty or sixty years ago by Perrine & Everett. Perrine sold his interest to Samuel Gordon, and Gordon & Everett sold the property to Samuel Whitehead, from whom it passed to members of the Brick family. In 1806, Thomas Roberts was living at Burt's Creek, and owned a little land there. Isaac Roberts, a son of his, is a resident of South Amboy.

Organization.—Sayreville township was created and its boundaries defined by an act of the Legislature passed April 6, 1876. The act provided that the first town-meeting of the inhabitants of Sayreville should be held at the school-house in School District No. 37 of Middlesex County on the second Monday in April following. The town committees of the townships of South Amboy and Sayreville were directed to meet May 1st next at the inn of Mrs. Clark in South Amboy, to allot and divide between the said townships all property or moneys on hand or due in proportion to the taxable property and ratables as valued and assessed by assessors within the respective limits of the two townships at the last preceding assessment, and it was provided that the inhabitants of Sayreville should pay their just proportion of any debt against the mother-town at the time of its division, and that the paupers dependent on the two townships should be divided in accordance with the law then in force determining the legal settlement of the poor.

Industrial Pursuits.—The extensive beds of sand and clay to be seen almost everywhere in Sayreville directly and indirectly furnish to the township all its present industries except a limited agricultural interest to which a comparatively few of its citizens, mostly thrifty Germans, have devoted themselves, enhancing the value of the otherwise undesirable land far beyond that of farming areas in any part of the country. The trade in these sands and clays and the manufacture from them of brick and potter's ware has gained for the township a reputation far and wide which it never could have obtained by virtue of any other resources appertaining to it.

KAOLIN CLAYS AND SAND.—The laminated clay and sand bed is worked for brick-clay in the pits on the William F. Fisher property, north of the road from Washington to Amboy, in those of Peter Fisher, just south of the same, and in H. F. Worthington's, still farther south. Those at the side of the road go down a few feet below tide-level. The clay of these pits is all dark and very tough, making good brick.

At the northerly Worthington pits the bottom of the excavation is about ten feet below high-water mark; at the southern end of the opening it is about at tide-level. Here the clay runs to the top of the ground, and there is no waste material to be removed. The thickness worked is about fifteen feet. At the bottom is a sandy, laminated bed, and over it a tough, bluish-black clay layer. The layers are all mixed together for the brick made there. A short distance northwest of the pits and near the yard a well sixty-five or sixty-eight feet deep was dug about twelve years ago which went through the clay formation. It was six feet in diameter for a depth of about thirty feet, and was then bored thirty-two feet in six holes, each two and one-half inches in diameter. From one of them water rose in abundance and filled the well to the overflow drain. In descending the first four or five feet the workmen passed through impure surface clay containing large quantities of sulphure of iron. From that on they passed through blue clay, which, however, grew gradually darker in color in descending until it became almost black. No sand was reached, but at the depth of thirty-five feet a clearly-defined stratum of clay was struck which was almost white and contained but very little sand. It is safe to infer that this white clay belongs to the Woodbridge fire-clay bed, and that the water came from the underlying fire-sand bed, the bottom of the well representing the bottom of the Woodbridge bed at this place.

On the Van Deventer place on the Jacksonville road a red brick-clay was formerly dug. The yard was on the meadows near the river, and the pits were not extensive. Nothing has been done there for a number of years. On the Freeland Van Deventer place there is a red brick yard, at the border of the tide meadows, and from it a canal to the river. Here Mr. Van Deventer made brick for several years from clay obtained from pits near the yard, but the works are now idle. White fire-clay has been found at several points on the tract, lying within two feet of the surface, about fifty yards northeast of the farmhouse, on the Washington road. This clay is sandy, contains white quartz, and has the appearance of some of the feldspars. The same bed is said to have been struck in a pit dug a few rods east of the house; also close to the surface in the swampy ground northeast of the house. The line of strike of the clay beds runs from George Such's banks across this property to South River, and the elevation of the South Amboy fire-clay bed on this line is thirty feet, which is about the height of the ground where the white clay has been discovered. The clay dug at the brick-yard is lower than this white fire-clay, and belongs, most likely, close under the kaolin. None of the fire-clay at this tract has been tested, the diggings having been made for exportation only.

The large brick-clay bank of Sayre & Fisher affords a very fine section of the strata, overlying the Woodbridge fire-clay bed and extending upward nearly to the horizon of the feldspar. The vertical section from the top of the bank to the tide-water in the river shows the following strata: (1) laminated clay and sand layers about 40 feet; (2) laminated sand containing some leaf impressions, $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 feet; (3) drab-colored clay (for front brick), 4 to 10 feet; (4) white sand, 5 feet; (5) black, sandy bed, very full of lignite and containing some leaf impressions, 6 to 7 feet; (6) sand (leaf-bed) at low-water mark. The bearing on (1) is nothing more than a part of the clayey soil changed by atmospheric agents and by cultivation. Towards the top of the bank the clay is somewhat faded and of a grayish color. Pyrite and lignite occur throughout all the strata. No order is recognized in the succession of the layers of the clay and sand, nor do they run in an unvarying thickness from one end of the bank to the other, but vary from point to point. Near the bottom of this thickness (1) there is a very tough and fat black clay about 4 feet thick; then comes the sand (2), which is of clean quartz and beautifully laminated; (3) is a drab-colored clay very persistent in all parts of the bank, from 4 to 10 feet thick, with an average top elevation above high-water mark of 15 feet, which is very compact and finely laminated, and splits on the strata lines into flat sheets and masses. Its specific gravity is 1.705 to 1.732; that of the more sandy, common brick-clay of the bank is 1.860 to 1.882. Under a magnifying glass of low power it appears full of minute plates of mica. Its composition is as follows:

Alumina, 27.42; silicic acid, 28.30; water (combined), 6.60; sand (quartz), 27.80; titanic acid, 1.00; potash, 2.71; magnesia, 18; sesquioxide of iron, 2.68; water (moisture), 2.90. Total, 99.59. A very little lignite and occasional small nodules of pyrite are in it. On burning it becomes pale yellow to white, and it is used successfully in the manufacture of pressed front brick. Geologically this bed is considered the equivalent of the top white clay north of the Raritan and the pipe-clay of other banks. Under this sand and leaf-bed and a few feet below tide-level has been found a white clay which is sufficiently refractory to make a No. 2 fire-brick. This latter bed of white clay was struck 25 to 30 feet beneath the surface in a well dug near Sayre & Fisher's office and store. The dip of the Woodbridge bed should therefore be found here at a depth of 10 to 15 feet below the water-level. The bank has a working face over a quarter of a mile long, and a very large amount of clay is dug every year. Cars running on narrow-gauge railways carry it to the yards.

Less than a quarter of a mile east of the bank of Sayre & Fisher James Wood digs a similar clay for his red brick yard. The strata are like those above described, and are an extension of the same. The digging does not go down quite so deep, the bottom being about ten feet above the level, but as the bank is farther to the southeast the dip of the strata compensates for this less depth, and the same brick clay is obtained as in Sayre & Fisher's bank, and the bank not being so high less thickness is worked. Mr. Wood uses his clay in his yards adjoining those of Sayre & Fisher on the east. The dark brick-clay has been found fifteen feet beneath the surface on the line of Sayre & Fisher's railway, about half-way between the brick-clay bank and the fire-clay pits, and it is also reported to have been found sixty feet beneath the fire-clay of this firm.

Fire-clay has been dug at several points on Sayre & Fisher's large tract. The banks formerly worked are between a quarter and a third of a mile northeast of the one now occupied, and all are north of the Washington and South Amboy road. At the latter there is much variation in the stratification, but the following order is generally observed:

(1) Gravelly earth and loam, 3 to 4 feet; (2) sand with earthy layers, 18 to 20 feet; (3) white fire-clay, 1 to 4 feet; (4) blue fire-clay, 4 to 9 feet; (5) sandy fire-clay, 2 to 3 feet; (6) clayey kaolin containing pyrite, 5 feet; (7) fine kaolin, 6 feet.

The gravelly earth at the top evidently is part of the drift which covers most of this country. The sand over the clay is beautifully laminated, and the thin, gently undulating layers have a slight dip towards the southeast, though in places they are horizontal. Through it there are some thin, loamy layers, in which the sand is mixed with a yellow earth. Towards the bottom, near the clay surface, the sand resembles glass-sand. The fire-clay is exceedingly uneven. The mean elevation above high-water level is sixty-five feet. In places there is a thickness of several feet of white, clayey kaolin between the top drift sand and the fire-clay bed. The white fire-clay at the top is probably blue clay faded; sometimes a little lignite is seen in it just over the blue clay. Towards the bottom of the bed the fire-clay becomes more sandy, grading into what is there termed a clay kaolin. The blue clay, the best of the fire-clay of the bank, is a homogeneous compact mass, having a specific gravity of 1.657 to 1.705. It does not fade or become discolored by exposure, and is composed as follows:

Alumina, 38.66; silicic acid, 41.10; water (combined), 13.55; sand, 3.10; titanitic acid, 1.20; potash, 0.28; soda, 18; sesquioxide of iron, 0.74; water (moisture), 1.00. Total, 99.81.

The kaolin at the bottom is very fine-grained, and contains a little white mica. The pits are generally stopped in this bed, as the water comes in quite freely, but borings have gone through it and into a dark sand, and then stopped in a dark clay. All of the clays, kaolin, and top-sand dug in this bank are used by this firm in their own works on the Raritan. The kaolin is largely used in the mixture for front brick, and is sent to the brick-yards by cars. The fire-clays are carted to the fire-brick works by team.

Only half a mile from the Raritan, along the old road to Burt's Creek, are the clay banks of Whitehead Brothers, extending a quarter of a mile from northwest to southeast, and on the line of the dip. Considerable variation in the character of the strata is seen, as well as in their arrangement. The first digging was in the southeast, in what is known as "the Bolton" pit. In this there was about sixteen feet of top-dirt and then a fire-clay bed twenty feet thick, having a top elevation of seventy to seventy-two feet, and lying upon kaolin. The bank as now worked shows at the south end the following order of strata: (1) yellowish-white sand, in places including some sandy clay layers, twenty-five to thirty feet; (2) yellow-buff clay and (3) blue fire-clay, one to twenty feet; (4) sand and kaolin, eight feet.

There is in places a thin layer of reddish gravel at the surface overlying the sand. In the northern part of this bank the strata appear in the following order and thickness:

(1) Reddish-yellow gravel and (2) yellowish-white sand with streaks of clay, twenty to twenty-five feet; (3) sandy bed (called kaolin), six feet; (4) fire-clay, four feet; (5) kaolin, four feet; (6) blue pipe-clay at the bottom. Some of the sand is sold to foundries and for building purposes. In the northmost pits there is, between the sand and the clay, a sandy layer which is sold as a kaolin. In some of the pits there is a thin stratum full of wood on the clay. It has not yielded any leaf impressions. Both the top and the bottom of the fire-clay bed are very uneven. The top height, northeast of the Burt's Creek road, is seventy-six feet. South of this and west of the road it is only sixty feet. The best fire-clay in this bank contains a little fine sand. Its specific gravity is 1.745 to 1.771. The layer under the fire-clay is not as sandy as that over it, and is the kaolin bed of the clay series. It is used in fire-brick. The black clay at the bottom contains both pyrite and lignite, and is not generally reached or dug. Only the best of it is valuable as pipe material. The red clay is sold to foundries and known as foundry clay. Some of the blue clay goes into fire-brick, and some of it is used for boiler linings. The clays from this bank have usually been sold in bulk, unsorted. Northwest of Whitehead's bank, near the Methodist Church, fire-clay has been dug.

From fifty to three hundred yards south of the Sayreville and Burt's Creek road, and near the head of a small stream running northward to the Raritan, are the east banks of Whitehead Brothers. The west group of pits were dug in 1877, and are nearest to the road. The surface of the ground is between forty and sixty feet high, and the yellow sand on the clay ranges from six to eight feet thick in a pit near the road to a thickness of twenty feet in the main bank one hundred yards from it. The top of the clay is, therefore, from thirty-five to forty feet, and that lying highest is sandy. About five feet down there is a layer eighteen inches thick, streaked very slightly by oxide of iron, which dries white. Under this the clay is blue and better, and toward the bottom it becomes sandy. The pits are dug eight to nine feet in clay, and do not go through it. The best of the clay procured here is slightly sandy, but that does not render it less refractory. A little southeast of these pits there is an older opening which has not been worked recently. The top of the clay bed in the southeastern part of this opening is fifty-four feet high, which is probably above the average elevation.

Whitehead Brothers' fire-sand pit is by the road-side a quarter of a mile east of the clay pits last referred to. At the top it shows from one to four feet of gravelly earth, eight feet of yellow fire-sand with streaks of loam, very sandy clay in a thin layer, and at the bottom sand and a clayey kaolin. The sand in this pit is mostly quite coarse and sharp-grained. It is carted to boats which load at the proprietors' dock on the river, and is sold for use in foundries and iron furnaces. About half-way from this pit to the dock and west of the road the same firm dig a moulding sand in the eastern side of a round hill which rises fifty feet above the surrounding surface and seventy feet above tide-level. A long excavation exposes to view about thirty feet of quite clean white quartz sand, finely laminated and covered by a yellow sandy earth a few feet thick and thinning away on the hillsides. This sand is sold to foundries and for building purposes. It is said there is a dark-colored clay under this sand bed. If there is, it doubtless belongs to the laminated clay and sand bed.

At Burt's Creek there is a clay bank on the J. K. Brick estate. The digging has been along the eastern and northeastern side of a ridge, and has exposed the strata along this for a quarter of a mile north and south. The top of the fire-clay is between twenty-eight and thirty-six feet high; but various heights appear within a few yards. The following shows the order and thickness of the several layers: (1) yellow sand, with some gravelly layers through it, fifteen to forty feet; (2) buff-colored fire-clay; (3) blue fire-clay and (4) sandy fire-clay, six to fourteen feet; (5) extra sandy clay and sand, seven feet.

The sand at the top is nearly all fine white quartz, alternating with very thin layers of quartz pebbles, and is thrown aside or used in filling up the pits. In some parts of the bank is a thin layer of black sandy earth, between this sand bed and the fire-clay, and in this lignite is abundant, and leaf impressions have been found in it. At other points the sand just over the clay for two to eight inches is cemented into a kind of stone by iron oxide. A red clay is got at the top of the more southeastern pits, and very frequently the top of the bed is buff-colored. The upper portion of the blue clay of the bed is considered the best, and is there designated as "XX" or "No. 1" clay. The paler blue portion, lower down, is marked "X" or "No. 2." Toward the bottom the bed is more sandy. The best clay is bluish-white, compact, having a specific gravity of 1.760 to 1.773, and containing an occasional scale of white mica. The No. 2 grade is a little sandy, and its specific gravity is 1.852 to 1.901. The kaolin consists of fine quartz and a little white clay, without mica, is considered a first-class article, and is used with the clays of this bank in fire-brick by the proprietors, E. D. White and Co., at the Brooklyn City Clay Retort and Fire-Brick Works, Van Dyke Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. The following layers are shown in the opening of another clay bank owned by the firm and located a few rods northwest of the main bank:

(1) Yellow sand, ten to fifteen feet; (2) dark-colored sandy clay, four feet; (3) black clay, full of lignite and pyrite, two to three and one-half feet; (4) black clay, used for ware or No. 2 brick, four feet; (5) yellow sand (boring), six feet.

The clay layer No. 2 is sandy, but the sand in it is fine-grained and dries nearly white. It is used in the manufacture of yellow-ware. The next layer is quite full of leaf impressions. Its only use is as a substitute for Albany slip or glazing pipe. The next lower clay is another potter's clay stratum, although generally put in the mixture for No. 2 fire-brick. The materials of these banks of the Brick estate are carted about a quarter of a mile to the dock, at the head of the long slip or canal which opens northward into the Raritan, and shipped to the works in Brooklyn.

The clay banks of George Such are on the Ridgway tract, east of Burt's Creek. A large area has been dug over, but it is all comprised in two groups of pits or openings. The eastern group, east of old Burt's Creek and Jacksonville road, is not now worked. The western bank is much larger, and is the scene of present operations. In so large an area there is considerable variation in the stratification, but all are within the range of the general order of arrangement of the members of the plastic clay series. The following order is presented as a fair approximate representative of the bank:

(1) Yellow sand, with thin layers of gravel, five to thirty-five feet; (2) dark-colored sandy clay, ten feet and under; (3) white fire-clay (average), ten feet; (4) mottled clay and (5) red clay, up to ten feet.

The dark-colored clay is sandy, containing more or less lignite, and some trunks of trees three feet across have been found in it. Pyrite is common in it, and amber is occasionally found. At present no use is made of this clay, though some of it is said to be good enough for drain-pipe. The average thickness of the fire-clay is ten feet. White, buff, and red clays are got. Some of the white clay contains pyrite. This clay is washed and thus cleared of this injurious constituent, probably about one-third of the total amount dug being thus treated. Some of it is very pure and of superior quality, and is sold for fire-brick. The so-called "paper"-clay used for glazing wall-paper is all washed. By a proper mixture of clays of different colors almost any desired shade is obtained. The following shows the composition of washed white clay: Alumina, 38.34; silicic acid, 42.90; water (combined) 13.50; sand (quartz), 1.50; titanin acid, 1.20; potash, 0.26; soda, 0.18; sesquioxide of iron, 0.86; water (moisture), 1.10. Total (determined), 99.84. These washed samples are lighter than the crude clays, the specific gravity of a buff paper clay being 1.530 to 1.571; that of the unwashed white clay being 1.716 to 1.751. All of its varied phenomena of arrangement, extent, and character give a peculiar interest to this bank, and make it a favorable place for observations both of a geological and practical nature. Generally the top of the fire-clay bed is white, lower down it is spotted red and white, and at the bottom red, and this order of colors not uniform nor everywhere observed. Some of the richer white clays, containing some pyrite, are sold for the manufacture of alum. A track runs to the washing-works near by, and to Such's dock on the Raritan, a mile distant. In the bank the track is shifted to suit the digging, and top-dirt and clays are readily carried in cars drawn by teams to the works, to the dock, or to the waste-dump. The washing-works are north of the clay bank, and about them are the large drying-vats used. The improvement of clays by washing is practiced at no other establishment in New Jersey. Half a mile southeast of Such's clay works are the clay pits of Laird & Furman. But little clay has been dug here, and the pits have not been operated for some years. There is an overlying yellow sand bed ten to fifteen feet thick. The Middlesex Company, on Burt's Creek, is mining and dealing in furnace sand and potter's clay and manufacturing much brick.

A tract of about seven hundred acres, known as the Kearney tract, borders the Raritan northeast of Burt's Creek, and upon it clay pits have been dug at several points. "The Western Pits" are on both sides of the old Burt's Creek and South Amboy road. Here the roadway divides the diggings into two groups of pits, one north the other south of it. On the north the top of this bed has an elevation of thirty-two to thirty-six feet; on the south its height is twenty-nine to thirty-five feet; but a difference of several feet is common within short distances. South of the road the average thickness of the clay bed is eight feet. Under it there is fine sand and kaolin. At the top a spit or two of the clay is white, next comes the blue or bluish-white, then the red clay. These are merely shades of color, all in one bed, and the color-line is the only one seen. The upper part of the northern bed is a buff clay. Below this it is bluish-white, the line between the two shades of color being distinct and clearly marked. Pyrites are quite abundant in the top of this buff clay. Each spit is examined, and the pyrite cut out and thrown aside. The clay thus sorted is sold for alum-making. The lower part of this buff clay is very rich, and is sold for glazing paper, commanding a high price. The bluish-white clay is rich in alumina, contains little foreign matter, and is esteemed the best of the bank. Its composition is given in the following analysis:

Alumina, 39.24; silicic acid, 42.71; water (combined), 13.32; sand (quartz), 0.70; titanin acid, 1.60; potash, 0.47; soda, 0.42; lime, 0.20; sesquioxide of iron, 0.46; water (moisture), 1.158; total, 100.70.

This clay approaches a pure kaolinite in composition, dries white and retains its whiteness. It is the most refractory of the clays dug here, and is sold for fire-brick. The best of the clays obtained here have a specific gravity of 1.702 to 1.742. No attempt has been made in these pits to utilize a fire-sand or kaolin found under the fire-clay. There is so much water in the stratum that its extraction is not practicable while digging the clay, as it would soon rush up and fill the pits. The "Northeastern Bank" is less than a quarter of a mile northeast of the pits just described. It is an older bank, in which work was resumed a few years ago. At the side of the road the pits pass through a bed of black sandy clay, also several feet thick, into the fire-clay. North of this about one hundred yards there is none of the black clay, but the sand-bed attains a maximum thickness of forty feet. A very few thin layers of white gravel occur in it. The whole has a plainly laminated structure, and much of the bed is very clean, sharp sand. The removal of so great a thickness of bearing, which is waste material, is costly, and compensated for only by the superior quality of the clays which it covers. The top of the clay bed here also has its characteristic inequalities of surface. At the top there is a white to faint-buff clay, reaching down four feet. The top spit of this contains a few pyrites, which are cut out. The remaining mass is very rich fine clay. The lower portion of this buff clay is almost free from impurities, and is considered the best clay of this tract. The following is the result of an analysis: Alumina, 39.14; silicic acid, 42.20; water (combined), 14.05; silica (sand), 0.20; titanic acid, 1.05; potash, 0.25; sesquioxide of iron, 0.45; water (moisture), 0.90. Total, 100.24. The purity of this clay is apparent at a glance at these figures. The blue portion of the bed under the buff is thought to be equally good, but it burns a little darker color. Selected lots from this bank are sold for ware, the buff going as a paper clay. The rest is good enough for fire-brick. Sand underlies the clay, and the digging stops when it is reached.

The Kearney clay bank is three-quarters of a mile northeast of the Roberts opening, and half a mile southeast of Kearney's dock. The ground about this opening is 70 to 80 feet high, and the top of the clay, as ascertained by the leveling done in 1855 by the geological survey, is 57 feet high. The fire-clay bed was 17 feet thick, of which 13 feet of the top was of good quality, and 4 feet at the bottom of spotted clay. The pits stopped at a sandy clay at the bottom. Resting on the fire-clay bed there was in places a black, lignite-bearing clay, but most of the top or bearing, which was 10 to 18 feet thick, was yellow sand. A kaolin was dug in the lower ground, about 200 feet from this clay bank, and at the side of the road. Its height above tide-level was 44 feet. In Roberts' bank (worked in 1855, but not lately), a few rods northeast of the Kearney bank, there was yellow sand 15 to 30 feet thick, then 14 feet of fire-clay, and the surface of this latter was found to be 58 feet above mean tide-level. The operators upon the Kearney tract, Messrs. E. F. & J. M. Roberts, make a practice of throwing the spits in heaps upon a board flooring at the side of the pit, sorting them into paper, ware, fire-brick, and alum clays, according to their quality. Most of these clays go either to Jersey City or to Trenton, although some are sent as far as Baltimore and Boston. The fire-brick clay is sold to manufacturers in Philadelphia, Reading, the Lehigh Valley, and other distant points. The aggregate production of the banks on this tract, worked steadily for so many years, is very large, and of this amount an unusually large proportion has been of very superior quality and has commanded high prices.

Fire-sand, feldspar, and sandy clay have been dug at the pits on the J. N. Coleman estate, a mile northwest of South Amboy, and near the road to Kearney's dock. At the most westerly pit a sandy material resembling feldspar is found a few feet below the surface. The top of this layer is about thirty feet high. In the pit southeast of the feldspar some clay has been dug, but it is said to have been in thin layers and of limited extent. A yellowish-white quartz sand forms the bearing in these pits. The fire-sand pit is in lower ground, northeast of the road. Both the fire-sand and clay dug on this property are very probably of drift origin, a part of the great sheet of sand, gravel, and clays which cover the members of the plastic clay beds in this part of the clay district.

The clays nearer the shore and southeast of these pits appear to be of like character.

W. C. Perrine's clay pits are located half a mile south of South Amboy, 200 yards northwest of the old Bordentown turnpike. A shaft was sunk 46 feet, 32 feet through sand and gravel, and 14 feet in a dark-colored tough clay, containing a little lignite and pyrite. This clay was deemed unsatisfactory for stoneware, and the shaft was abandoned. West of South Amboy, and near Roberts' banks, W. C. Perrine dug a little clay, merely as an exploration, and operations there were speedily abandoned. The clay pits of E. R. Rose & Son and the adjacent diggings of W. C. Perrine are at the side of the Camden and Amboy Railroad, near the old Bordentown turnpike. The ground here and for some distance to the north and west is rather flat, and 60 to 80 feet above tide-level. The strata observed in these pits are in the following order and thickness, beginning at the surface:

(1) Sand, gravel, and very sandy clay, six to ten feet; (2) stoneware clay, six feet; (3) dark-colored sandy earth at the bottom.

The clay bed varies in thickness, having been found as much as fifteen feet thick, including eight feet of the top clay, which is sandy and stained a little by oxide of iron. This top clay is sold for common yellow-ware manufacture. The stoneware clay has a grayish color, and is marked by dark spots of oxide of iron, so characteristic of the clay of this bed, and known as "fly-specked clay." It is very solid, and its specific gravity is 2.129 to 2.151. The composition of this clay is as follows:

Alumina, 20.12; silicic acid, 28.60; water (combined), 7.22; sand (quartz), 37.10; titanic acid, 1.10; potash, 1.50; soda, traces; magnesia, 0.29; sesquioxide of iron, 1.38; water (moisture), 4.18. Total, 101.49.

The bed becomes more sandy towards the bottom, and in the more northeastern pits it is underlaid by a dark-colored sandy clay, which farther west is replaced by a looser sandy earth. The top of the bed, as opened in Rose's pits, has a mean height of seventy feet above tide-level. W. C. Perrine's clay pits are in the flat ground southwest of Rose's, and the beds have the same average thickness as the latter. West of the pits of W. C. Perrine, and near the Burt's Creek and Jacksonville road, stoneware clay has been found in borings made by Otto Ernst. The layer penetrated was only one foot thick, a foot and a half beneath the surface, and under it there was white sand. Its elevation above tide-level was about sixty-seven feet. So thin a layer is of no practical value. Two other borings near this one did not show any clay.

The deep valley of Crossway Brook, south of South Amboy, running from the old Bordentown turnpike to Cheesquake Creek, affords favorable localities for opening the stoneware bed. E. R. Rose & Son, Morgan & Furman, W. C. Perrine, and William Hayes have pits in this valley, and near its mouth Otto Ernst has a clay bank. At the clay pits of E. R. Rose & Son the following strata are cut: (1) yellow sandy gravel and (2) yellowish-white sand, ten feet; (3) dark drab-colored clay, one foot; (4) blue stoneware clay, six to seven feet; (5) yellow streaked earth at the bottom. These pits are on the west side of the valley, southeast of the residence of Mr. Rose. Morgan & Furman's pits and mines are across the brook from the pits just described, and not more than a mile southwest of South Amboy. The following is the order of beds:

(1) Yellow sandy gravel, 2 to 4 feet; (2) yellow sand, 10 to 11 feet; (3) black clay (not in all the pits), 3 to 4 feet; (4) blue stoneware clay, 10 feet; (5) dark red clay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet. At the bottom there is generally a sandy black clay. The northeast pits are about a hundred yards from the western opening and in higher ground. The surface has an elevation of ninety-six feet. In these pits the top-dirt consists of yellow sand and gravel, 6 to 8 feet, and black clay, 3 to 4 feet. The blue stoneware bed is 10 feet thick, and lies upon a black clay. Neither of these places is now being worked. The first work was done in 1876. On ground northeast from the last-mentioned openings shafts have been sunk and work has since been done. The pit of Ward C. Perrine, about sixty rods southeast of Morgan & Furman's mines, is one of the oldest in this valley. The stoneware clay there is said to be about three feet thick. Down the valley farther are the pits of William Hayes, which were opened in 1867, the clay being carted to South Amboy. The following strata are seen in these pits:

(1) Yellow gravel, 1 to 3 feet; (2) yellow sand, 12 feet; (3) stoneware clay, 5 to 6 feet; (4) dark drab-colored clay, 1 to 2 feet; (5) yellowish earthy clay (yellow streaked) at the bottom.

Morgan's old and well-known clay bank is one mile south of South Amboy, on the shore of Raritan Bay. The following is the order of the succession of strata and their thickness at this bank, beginning at the surface:

(1) Laminated sand and sandy clay, 40 feet; (2) sandy clay (inferior), 8 feet; (3) blue stoneware-clay, 3 feet; (4) red (including peach-blossom clay), 6 feet; (5) stoneware-clay, becoming sandy at the bottom, 5 feet; (6) sand at the bottom.

The method of excavation here has been somewhat varied. More commonly the top dirt is removed, and then large pits are sunk in the clay, which are in turn filled by the bearing of the succeeding pit, and so on. Sometimes a pit is dug, and then from it short drifts are cut in the clay bed, after which the top is allowed to fall down and fill the excavated space. From the pits the clay is carted at low tide to vessels lying off the shore. Most of it is sold for stoneware, but a large quantity goes to Norwalk, Conn., and elsewhere to door-knob factories. This bank is one of the oldest in the State or country, potter's clay having been dug here before 1800. Otto Ernst's clay beds at salt-works dock, on the north bank of Cheesquake Creek, half a mile from its mouth, were formerly worked by the Amboy Clay Company. Here there seem to be two distinct beds,—an upper one, which was worked in the bank, being from 5 to 7 feet thick and 10 feet above high-water level, and a lower one, which is 17 feet thick and 12 to 29 feet below the same level.

POTTERY AND BRICK-MAKING.—Clay from Morgan's banks was used in making stoneware about 1800. Soon afterwards Xerxes Price, perhaps in company with some of his brothers, purchased the property at Roundabout and began making stoneware pottery, using clay from Morgan's old bank. The plentiful supply of clay close at hand and its excellent adaptation to brick manufacture, the small amount of waste material to be removed, the natural drainage, and the convenience of navigable waters combine to render Sayreville one of the greatest brick-making areas in the country.

James Wood was the first to embark in this business, beginning to make common brick in 1851 on his clay property at Roundabout. At the outset his works had a manufacturing capacity of fifteen thousand bricks daily, which has increased to fifty thousand. His yard covers a large area, his sheds being seventy by five hundred feet, and containing five kilns, each twenty-eight by fifty-six feet, all heated from ninety-four arches. A fifty horse-power engine is employed, seventy men being required to do the labor connected with the various processes. The present annual production is eight-million brick. There is a store on the property, which Mr. Wood conducts for the accommodation of his employes.

In the fall of 1851, Peter Fisher and James Sayre, Jr., the former from Fishkill, N. Y., the latter a resident of Newark, began the manufacture of common brick on the Price property, west of Wood's yard. In 1861 this firm began making fire-brick at Sayreville. Sayre & Fisher rank among the most extensive brick manufacturers of the United States, having five yards containing twenty-one kilns, their operations covering many acres, involving the erection of several large sheds and the employment of about two hundred men. In the report of the State geological survey of 1878 the annual product of the yards of Sayre & Fisher was computed to twenty-two million bricks, to make which would require at least fifty thousand tons of raw material. In 1858 this firm began manufacturing common brick near the bridge from Sayreville to Washington. This business passed entirely into the ownership of Peter Fisher in 1876. At this place the annual production is estimated at four million bricks.

Near this last-mentioned yard Robert L. Serviss began making common hard brick in 1853, abandoning the enterprise in 1871. During a portion of this time the yard was operated by Tuttle & Serviss. In 1877 the property was purchased by William F. Fisher, who made many improvements upon it and added much to the capacity of the works.

Adjoining Peter Fisher's brick-yard on South River, near the road from Washington to South Amboy, the Washington Brick Company established a yard in 1868, and the business was continued until the death of H. F. Worthington in 1879. The capacity of these works is large, but they are now idle.

The brick-yards of the Middlesex Company are located on Burt's Creek near the Raritan. This company began operations in 1881, with Peter H. Valentine as president, E. Belknap as treasurer, Mr. S. Higbee as general manager, Lawrence Neubrandt as superintendent, and M. S. Ross as secretary, manufacturing fire-brick and furnace-blocks, which are burned in what are known among brick-makers as "square-down draught-kilns." The capacity of the works is twenty thousand bricks per day, one hundred and ten men are employed, the factory measures ninety by one hundred and sixty feet, the kilns are four in number, each having four arches, and an engine of one hundred horse-power is used. The products of this establishment are shipped chiefly to New York State and Pennsylvania.

E. F. Roberts carried on the manufacture of common brick for some years on the Kearney tract, but abandoned the business to engage in the sand and clay trade.

GEORGE SUCH'S GREEN-HOUSE.—One of the most notable of Sayreville's industries is the celebrated green-house of George Such, on the Ridgway property on Burt's Creek. This enterprise has gradually grown to large proportions, having its nucleus in a small green-house established by Mr. Such for his recreation, and with no idea that it would ever become in any sense a business. Its growth has been of that kind which cannot be expressed statistically or descriptively, but it has been steady and substantial, and Mr. Such now offers to lovers of the beautiful in flower-culture as good a collection of fine plants as is to be found in the Union, his trade extending to all parts of this country and to foreign lands, many of his plants surpassing those of the same varieties grown in England and France. His hot-houses are six in number. Three of them measure each one hundred feet by twelve, and three each one hundred and twenty-five feet by twenty. Near by are a fernery fifty feet by forty, and a house for pitcher plants one hundred feet by twenty. Ten men are employed.

Villages and Hamlets.—SAYREVILLE is a small village which has grown up under the influence of the extensive brick industry carried on there and near there. It was formerly called Roundabout, a name derived from the fact that it was accessible by water only by a very circuitous route by way of the Raritan and South Rivers. In 1872 it was renamed in honor of James R. Sayre, Jr., an extensive land-owner and manufacturer there. The first and only postmaster to date is Peter Fisher. The population is above eight hundred, mostly employes at the several brick-yards about the village and other families.

There are at Sayreville two stores, kept by Sayre & Fisher and James Wood, a Methodist Church, a school-house, a hotel, and a saloon, with such a number of dwellings as are necessary for the accommodation of the inhabitants. The Sayreville Hotel was established in 1870 by Maximilian Bailey; the Mitchell House, as the other public-house is known, in 1877 by Christian Mitchell. Sayreville, as the principal settlement within the new township, gave its name to the latter upon its organization.

BURT'S CREEK.—This is the name by which is known a scattered neighborhood extending along the creek of that name from near its mouth to its headwaters. Within its not very definite limits are the steam clay-works and green-houses of George Such, and the brick-factory of the Middlesex Company, and several dwellings.

MECHANICSVILLE.—The extreme southwestern corner of what was the village of South Amboy before the erection of Sayreville, now separated from South Amboy proper by the boundary line between the two townships, is called Mechanicsville. It embraces between four and five blocks of village lots, and contains a few dwellings.

Schools.—Nothing definite or interesting of early schools in this township is ascertainable. There are two school districts in Sayreville, of which that at the village is the older and most important. These are numbered 37 and 25 in the enumeration of the school districts of Middlesex County, and are locally known respectively as "Brickland" and "Ernstont."

The number of children of the school age in Sayreville township in 1881 was 148 in District No. 37, and 92 in District No. 25. In 1880 schools were kept open nine and three-tenths months in District No. 37, and eight months in District No. 25. In District No. 37 the average attendance was 90, in District No. 25, 20. It was estimated that in the former district 8 attended select school, and in the latter 25; 37 in District No. 37 and 28 in District No. 25 attended no school. The school-house in District No. 37 will seat 125 scholars; that in District No. 25, 60. One male and one female teacher were employed in District No. 37, at salaries of $45 and $33 per month respectively. A female teacher was employed in District No. 25 at $16.50 per month. The apportionment from State appropriation to Districts Nos. 37 and 25 was $633.77 and $300 respectively. For the payment of teachers' salaries $150 was voted in District No. 25. The amount of district school tax voted for building, purchasing, hiring, repairing, or furnishing public school houses was $400 in District No. 37, and $150 in District No. 25. In District No. 37 the total amount of district tax ordered to be raised was $400; in District No. 25, $300. The total amount received from all sources for public school purposes in Districts Nos. 37 and 25 was $1033.77 and $600 respectively. The present value of school property in District No. 37 is $1600. The school-house in District No. 25 is a rented building. In District No. 37 a fund is being raised with a view to establishing a school library, $20 having been received to date (1882).

Churches.—SAYREVILLE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—Old Bethel Circuit, out of which Sayreville station grew, had its origin in 1842, at which time Rev. J. B. Dobbins was pastor. The charges as then arranged were Bethel Church of Sayreville, with 80 members; Old Bridge Church, with 27 members; and Princeton Church, with 12 members, making 119 members. The circuit at this time included the district of country embracing Princeton, South Amboy, and Roundabout.

In 1848 occurred in records the first mention of what is now the Sayreville Church. The class was formed at Roundabout, and was composed of John Van Deventer, Eliza Van Deventer, John Slover, Peter Van Deventer, Louisa Bolton, Lorenzo Van Deventer, Mary Slover, and Sister Bolton, and services were held in private houses. In 1850 the name of the charge was changed to Middlesex Mission, and then included Washington, Old Bridge, South Amboy, Fresh Pond, and Roundabout.

In 1869 the erection of a church edifice in Sayreville was commenced, and the corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies by Revs. E. H. Stokes, C. R. Hartranft, B. F. Sharp, I. H. Mickel, and J. J. Corrin. This building was completed in 1872, and dedicated in June, 1878. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. T. Hanlan, D.D.

For a period of years this church and that at Washington were connected. In 1874 Roundabout was separated from the Washington Church and became a separate station, with Rev. Firman Robbins as its first pastor. His successors have been Rev. David McCurdy, 1875-77; Rev. A. J. Gregory, 1878; and Rev. John Handly, the present pastor, 1879-82.

The present trustees are Peter Fisher, I. Letts, J. Blew, J. Slover, and I. Griffin. The church has a membership of fifty, and is in a prosperous condition. The house of worship is of brick, thirty-three by forty-three feet, with a "recess pulpit," is pleasantly located on a high elevation overlooking South River, and cost $6600. The parsonage, which is of brick, cost $1816.

THE HOLY TRINITY CHAPEL.—In the school-house at Sayreville Episcopalian services were held in 1859 by Rev. Gideon J. Burton, rector at that time of Christ Church, South Amboy.

Jan. 12, 1860, Rev. Mr. Burton laid the corner-stone of the Holy Trinity Chapel, and on the 14th of the following April he held the first service in the new house of worship, which was consecrated by Right Rev. Bishop Odenheimer on Whit-Sunday, 1861.

The cost of the erection of this chapel was but little more than $1000, which amount was donated for such use by Miss Sophia Conover, then a resident of South Amboy. The land on which it stood was given by Mr. William Van Deventer.

At the suggestion of Rev. Gideon J. Burton, and with the consent of those whose benefactions had made its erection possible, and with the sanction of the ecclesiastical authorities of the diocese, this structure was taken down and removed to Washington, in East Brunswick, in the summer of 1876.

The Washington Canal.—In 1823 a charter was procured for a canal something more than a mile in length from South River to the Raritan, traversing the narrowest part of the western portion of the present township, its object being to shorten the distance by water from Washington to the Raritan, thus facilitating the carrying trade from that point. This canal was constructed by Samuel Gordon, of South Amboy, as contractor, and finished about 1824 or 1825, and has since been familiarly known by the above name.

CRANBURY.¹

Situation and Boundaries.—Cranbury, containing nine thousand one hundred and sixteen acres, is the smallest township in the county except South Amboy, and was the last organized. In its entirety it is the most southern of the townships, though the southern extremity of Monroe extends farther southward than the southern limit of Cranbury. It is bounded north by South Brunswick and Monroe, east by Monroe, south by East Windsor and West Windsor (Mercer County), and (if from its peculiar wedge-like shape it may be said to have a western boundary) on the west by Princeton (Mercer County).

Descriptive.—The surface of Cranbury is slightly rolling, and the soil is generally well cultivated and in most parts quite productive. It is drained by Cranbury Brook, which flows across it east and west, and Millstone River, which has its course along its southern border. The principal thoroughfares are the New Brunswick and Cranbury turnpike (the old George's road) and the Cranbury and Princeton turnpike. The Camdeu and Amboy Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad defines a portion of the eastern boundary and crosses the southeastern corner, and the New York Division of the same railroad crosses the township near its western extremity. In 1880 the real estate in Cranbury was valued at $624,600, the personal property at $805,000, the number of voters was 390.

Settlement and Early Occurrences.—The earliest data concerning any portion of the present township of Cranbury is to the effect that within ten days after the confirmation (March 14, 1682) of East Jersey to the twenty-four proprietors (of whom John Haywood and Thomas Cooper were two) by the Duke of York, John Haywood conveyed his share to Robert Burnett, who divided his possessions and sold them out in parcels, one of which, embracing a tract in Cranbury, bounded east by George's road and south by Cranbury Brook, was granted in 1703 by Isabella McKinsie to Philip French, of New York City.

In 1734 the heirs of Philip French sold this tract to Noah Barton, who sold the part on which most of the northern part of Cranbury village has grown up to Samuel Leonard. From Leonard it passed to Peter Wyckoff, and a portion of it has since remained in possession of successive generations of his descendants.

Thomas Cooper seems to have held the land embracing that part of the village south of the brook. In 1683 he sold one-half of his tract to Sir John Gordon, whose son, Sir Robert Gordon, sold the same in 1720 to John Rothead. In 1736, John Rothead conveyed four acres and a half on the brook to Thomas Grubbs, doubtless as a seat for a grist-mill, for it is recorded that Thomas Grubbs conveyed this same lot, together with a grist-mill, to John Collins in 1741. There is no means of ascertaining how much of a settlement had at that time grown up about the mill, which must be regarded as the probable nucleus of whatever population the vicinity then and has since contained.

THE NAME OF THE TOWNSHIP.—The settlement and subsequent village received their name from the brook on whose banks they had their beginning and growth, and the village transmitted the name to the township.

When and by whom Cranbury Brook was named is not known. During former years the name was often erroneously spelled Cranberry. The following paragraph on this subject from the pen of Rev. Joseph G. Symmes, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Cranbury since 1857, will be found interesting in this connection:

"The name of the fruit cranberry is of Scotch origin. It was called craneberry, from a real or fancied resemblance of its stem to the neck of the crane, and was modified by dropping the 'e'. It was the emblem to Scotland of the Grant clan. The name was undoubtedly given to the stream on which our village stands from the fact that the berries were found upon its meadows. And when applied to a stream, or meadow, or prairie, the correct spelling is Cranberry. But there is no reason or meaning in that spelling as applied to a town. The old English custom, which our early fathers, of course, followed, was to call a district or town a borough, which was contracted into burg or bury, according to whichever they thought sounded best. Hence the ending of many names of towns, both in England and in this country, as Casterbury, Woodbury, Dachbury, Williamsburg, Jamesburg,—never spelled berry. When this village began to grow up the natural method was to call it Cranberry borough or town; the berry would be dropped, and there would be Cranborough, or, contracting it, Cranbury. And so the old documents and records which were written by those who knew how to spell or were careful in spelling have the name Cranbury. The origin of the name, its proper meaning, and the best authority in spelling make it Cranbury. Cranberry suggested to strangers a low, swampy, sandy country, which this is not. It is possible on some spots along the brook to raise the fruit, but the surrounding country is adapted to almost anything better than to that purpose. Let us have the correct, respectable, historical spelling."

While it is possible a very few scattering settlers may have located west of the site of Cranbury village, towards Plainsboro', prior to the beginning of settlement at Cranbury, it is not by those who have given the subject much investigation deemed very probable that such was the case.

The Wyckoff and Perrine families were early comers, and the latter is now very numerous in the township and adjoining ones.

The grist-mill property, as has been seen, was in possession of Thomas Grubbs from 1736 to 1741, and it is reasonably supposed that the mill was erected about 1737 or 1738. In July, 1739, James Rothead conveyed to Coert Van Voorhees and Thomas Storey a lot of ground adjoining the mill property, "to be for the use of the elders and deacons of the Presbyterian Church of Cranbury," for erecting a house of worship, in consideration of two pounds to him duly paid.

The settlement must by that date have contained several families, as a church had been formally organized and officered. Voorhees and Storey immediately conveyed the lot to Nicholas Stevens and Peter Perrine, elders, and John Brown and William Magee, deacons of the said church, which is thought to have been then only recently organized, and it is supposed there had been little preaching in the Cranbury settlement until the year before. At the first meeting of the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1738, appeared John Chambers, a commissioner from Cranbury, asking for a supply. Rev. Gilbert Tennent was appointed to preach there and at Allentown.

At another meeting of the Presbytery, held in the autumn of the same year, Stephen Wagner presented a petition from the people of Cranbury and vicinity asking for advice in a matter of difficulty concerning a house of worship. It seems that Presbyterians and "people of the Church of England persuasion," as they were termed, had united in building a church on the spot now occupied by the "Old Church" school-house, in School District No. 62 in Monroe, east of Cranbury. When the house was built and how it was used it has not been possible to ascertain.¹ Diligent search has not revealed one fact concerning it previous to 1738, nor can it be ascertained when it ceased to be used as a house of worship; but it was long used as a school-house. All traces of the house have now disappeared except, it may be, a few timbers in some neighboring building, and the spot is only marked by a few neglected graves. But the trouble then concerned its use. Presbytery held an adjourned meeting at Cranbury to compose the difficulty, which was done by advising that one or the other party should sell out their right. The record does not state the fact, but it was evidently the Presbyterians who sold out, for they took measures the next year to build a new house; and for the site they came near the mill, as has been seen. Probably the settlers at Cranbury had not until then attained any numerical strength. Whenever and by whomsoever besides some persons supposed to have lived in Cranbury the old church in Monroe had been erected, it must have been located there because its supporters in that direction outnumbered all others elsewhere, those at Cranbury included, for in such matters the majority generally ruled then as now.

PROMINENT MEN OF THE PIONEER PERIOD.—It has been seen that the leading spirits in the movement to establish a church at Cranbury were Coert Van Voorhees and Thomas Storey, who purchased the lot from James Rothead; Nicholas Stevens and Peter Perrine, elders, and John Brown and William Magee, deacons, to whom they transferred it; and John Chambers and Stephen Wagner, who represented the Cranbury Presbyterians at New Brunswick; and these, with James Rothead, Peter Wyckoff, and Thomas Grubbs, the mill proprietor, may be fairly regarded as having been at the time among the most prominent residents at and near the Cranbury settlement, if, indeed, they all did live in that vicinity. John Collins, who bought the grist-mill and the four acres of land surrounding it of Grubbs in 1741, is reasonably supposed to have become a resident there, but whether Grubbs removed to some other locality or remained is uncertain. Except that Coert Van Voorhees was a descendant of the Van Voorhees who was the progenitor of the present family of Voorhees in America,¹ and a later supporter of the church, nothing can be stated concerning him, save that he is believed upon reasonable ground to have been descended indirectly from some of the name living in North Brunswick, which included New Brunswick till 1860. Save what is above set forth, little of interest is known in reference to any of the others above mentioned. One John Storey was during the Revolution a resident of South Brunswick, of whose territory Cranbury was then a part, and is thought to have been a descendant of Thomas Storey, who, as was also John Storey, was later a supporter of the church. The names of Wyckoff and Perrine have come down to the present through several generations. Peter Perrine had two brothers named William and Elijah, who were also early settlers in the vicinity of Cranbury. They were without doubt descended from the brothers Henry and Daniel Perrine, Huguenot refugees, who with others of French nativity were stranded on the southeastern shore of Staten Island with the rickety old ship "Caledonian," whose timbers providentially held together long enough to bring her passengers to the land they sought, some time after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685.

Peter Perrine married a woman named Holman, and had several children. It is to be regarded as somewhat remarkable that five of his daughters married men named Dey, of some of the Dey families of South Brunswick, and many of their descendants are living in the county now. Two of the sons of Peter Perrine were named Enoch and Andrew, whose descendants have been numerous and many of them well known.

A considerable tract of land, embracing Cranbury Station, was the farm of William Perrine. It was cut in two by the construction of the railroad, the depot now standing about in its centre as formerly bounded.

William Perrine married Hannah Mount; his children were named Matthias, John, Peter, Humphrey, William, Daniel, Lydia, Ann, Margaret, Rebecca, and Hannah. (1) Matthias married Ann Knott and lived between Cranbury and Prospect Plains. He had children named David K., Ann K., Hannah, Lydia, Eliza Jane, Catharine, Rachel, Margaret, Susan, and Mary. David K. married Elizabeth Tilton and lived near Prospect Plains. His children were Charles H., Mary E., and Elwood. (2) John lived and died in Cranbury. His wife was Betsy Riggs. Peter, William, John, Abraham J., and George were the names of his children, none of whom live in the vicinity. (3) Peter married Ann Duncan and removed to New York State before 1800. (4) Humphrey espoused Fanny Dodd, and his son, Dr. William Perrine, is a resident of Brooklyn, N. Y. (5) William married Sarah Voorhees and removed to Philadelphia, and thence to Somerville, N. J., where he died. He had two daughters. (6) Daniel and (7) Hannah died unmarried. (8) Lydia married Thomas Baldwin; (9) Anna, Israel Baldwin; (10) Margaret, Maj. James Cook; and (11) Rebecca, John McMichael.

(1) Elijah Perrine married Betsy Perrine and lived on the Trenton road. Of what family of Perrines his wife was does not appear, though she is supposed to have descended from the same ancestors as the three brothers mentioned. The children of Elijah and Betsy Perrine were Peter, Henry, William, John, Ellen, Margaret, Lydia, and Sarah. (2) Peter married into the Rue family, and after the death of his first wife married Lydia Ward. His children were Alfred, Ward C., Mary, and Elizabeth. Ward C. has long been a prominent business man at South Amboy. (3) Henry married Jemima Healy, by whom he had children named Charlotte, Ann, Matilda, Lydia, Samuel E., John Henry, Rebecca, and Mary. (4) William espoused Mary Hunt. Their children were Sarah, Ann, Ellen, and Hannah. (5) John was twice married,—first to Miss P. Vinewright, then to Elizabeth Wilbur. His children were Elizabeth, Rebecca, Elijah, and Sarah, and two sons. (6) Ellen married William Rue, and settled at Matchaponix in Monroe. (7) Margaret married Cornelius Suydam; (8) Lydia, Peter Rue. Both removed to Matchaponix. (9) Sarah married Garret J. Suediker, of Cranbury, and bore him children named Alexander, Jacob, Anna Elizabeth, Edward, John, and Henry.

Peter Wyckoff is supposed to have been the progenitor of Peter Wyckoff, who married Elizabeth Baird, and located at the locality known as Wyckoff's Mills, and had children named Peter, Jr., John, Jacob, David B., Mary Ann, Gertrude, and two others. Peter married a Miss Pullen, and died at Wyckoff's Mills. John died at Hight-town. Jacob married Arnelia Robbins, and located in the vicinity of Cranbury. David B. married Elizabeth Perrine, and settled at Hightstown. Mary Ann married Elias Conover, and resided and died in Monmouth County. Gertrude married Rev. James Maxwell, and lives at Hightstown. The children of David B. were Addison, Anna, John P., Elizabeth, Monroe, Virginia, and Josephine, who died young.

OTHER PIONEER FAMILIES.—An early settler in Cranbury was Thomas Duncan, and we trace his genealogy as far back as scanty records, land titles, and well-founded traditions will permit. The Duncan fathers came from Scotland, and in a sectarian way were what may be termed Presbyterians. It appears that Jabez Duncan was a soldier in Philip's war, of Capt. Turner's company, in April, 1676. Joseph Duncan was killed by the Indians June 27, 1689, with twenty-two others. Nathaniel Duncan, at Dorchester, in 1630 came, doubtless in the "Mary and John," with the other first settlers of that town, bringing with him perhaps his wife, Elizabeth, and his son, Nathaniel (who was connected with an artillery company in 1644), and later had a son Peter. About 1641 he removed to Boston, and died about 1668. The last-named son also belonged to the artillery company in 1654. He removed to Gloucester, and had children,—Martha, Elizabeth, Ruth, Peter, Priscilla, Margery, and Daniel.¹ The tradition of one of the ancestors of the Duncan family having been killed by the Indians was handed down to later generations, and Stephen Duncan, who died aged eighty-three in 1867, often spoke of it. Little doubt is entertained that either Peter or Daniel Duncan above mentioned was the father of Thomas, the statements made years ago by several of the old men of the Duncan family supporting this theory. Thomas purchased a large tract of land on Cranbury Neck, lived upon it, and apportioned it out among his children. Two old deeds for lands, including the old farm of Stephen Duncan, dated Feb. 1, 1749, are in existence. They are from Thomas Duncan to his sons, William and John. The name Thomas Duncan is written in a good business hand, though evidently the signature of an old man. John (son of Thomas) had sons,—Daniel, John, Thomas

(for nearly thirty years a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Cranbury), and Stephen. John Duncan had two sons, Peter Duncan, Esq., and John I., and a daughter, the late wife of William Tindall, of Hightstown. The descendants of Elder Thomas Duncan are numerous and respectable. The Duncan descendants are still very generally Presbyterians in the old neighborhood. John I. Duncan, who died aged seventy-three in 1873, was highly esteemed, and was for many years a land surveyor and business man. He leaves a large, respectable family.

Among the early settlers was Isaac De Bow. Whether any one of the name of an earlier generation was in Cranbury is unknown. (1) Isaac, the progenitor of later generations, was a blacksmith, and plied his avocation in Cranbury as early as 1750. His children were Garret, John, James, Daniel, and Isabel. (2) Garret married Elizabeth Gilliland and located in the village. His children were James and David. James married Matilda Dey, and removed to Allegheny County, Pa. David married Ellen Reed, and located in the village. His children were Jane, Elizabeth, Margaret, James, Sarah, and William. (3) John married and removed to New York State. (4) James died unmarried. (5) Isabel married a Griggs, and removed to New Brunswick.

(1) Matthew Rue, who located in Monroe previous to 1750, buying a large tract of land partially in what is now Cranbury, had children named Joseph, Samuel, William, Matthew, Jr., James, Matthias, John, Ellen, and Margaret. But little is known of any of them except (2) Matthew, Jr., who married Catherine Voorhees, settling on a portion of his father's property, which he intersected, lying on the Cranbury side of the present township boundary line, and had children named Matthew, Samuel, Margaret, Catherine, Ellen, and Charlotte. (3) Matthew went to Ohio, and there died. (4) Samuel married Anna Wyckoff, and located on the homestead. His children were John, Matthew A., Edmund S., William C., Alfred, Margaret, and Elizabeth. John died unmarried. Matthew A. married Emeline Anderson, and is a well-known business man of Cranbury village. His children are Alfred A., William H., and L. A. Rue. Edmund married Margaret Gilliland, and located on the homestead. William married Rebecca Shreeve, and died on Staten Island. Alfred espoused Mary Ann Stulls, and lives in the village. Margaret married Henry Vandewater, and removed from the township. Elizabeth is the wife of James Heath, of Kingston. (5) Margaret married William Perrine, and removed to Ohio. (6) Catherine became the wife of John Dey, and (7) Margaret of Runey Dey. Charlotte married John Veighte. The latter three located in South Brunswick.

Among the old families of Cranbury may be accounted that of the Van Kirks. The first of the name who is known to have resided in the township was (1) John Van Kirk, who lived near the grist-mill in the village, and had sons named Oakley and Andrew. (2) Oakley died unmarried, and (3) Andrew married and had eleven children, named Gordon, Nancy, Lavinia, Ida, Jane, Mary, Catherine, John, Lucinda, Sarah, and Keziah. Gordon, Nancy, Lavinia, Ida, Sarah, and Keziah all died unmarried. Jane married and removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., and died there. Mary married Alexander Alexander, and died in New York, where Catherine removed with her husband, Henry Hathaway. John is living at Allentown, Pa. Lucinda married Abraham Voorhees, and after his death William Schenck, and is a resident of Cranbury.

All that has been found possible to learn of those who have any claim to memory as pioneers in Cranbury has been carefully set forth with all the detail the data has permitted. The names of many others, about whom the writer has been unable to learn anything in detail, will be presented farther on.

REV. DAVID BRAINERD AT CRANBURY.—In the journal of David Brainerd appears this record: "June 18, 1745. In the afternoon came to a place called Cranbury, and meeting with a serious minister lodged with him." This "serious minister," whose bearing seems to have favorably impressed the missionary, was Rev. Charles McKnight, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Cranbury from 1744 to 1778. Whether Brainerd had visited the place previous to the date of the above entry in his journal does not appear, but his mention of the locality as "a place called Cranbury" inclines us to believe that he was not at the time familiar with it. In 1746 he removed to this vicinity with some of his Indian followers. At the north end of the present village of Cranbury stood a majestic elm, under whose wide-spreading branches some of the forefathers of the present residents there heard the devoted missionary preach to his wondering and at times greatly moved aboriginal congregation. A few years ago the tree fell before the progress of improvement, but some few relics remain of the town of Bethel, which Brainerd began, a few miles away, and his brother John completed.¹

Brainerd was full of fire and force, vividly picturing in beautiful yet simple language to his red auditors the blessings of salvation. The following extracts from his journal will show the effects which followed his preaching:

"August 8th. In the afternoon I preached to Indians. Their number was now about sixty-five persons,—men, women, and children. I discoursed from Luke xiv. 16-23, and was favored with uncommon freedom. There was much concern among them while I was discoursing publicly, but afterwards when I spoke to one and another more particularly whom I perceived under concern, the power of God seemed to descend upon the assembly 'like a rushing mighty wind,' and with an astonishing energy bore down all before it.

"I stood amazed at the influence that seized the audience almost universally, and could compare it to nothing more aptly than a mighty torrent that bore down and sweeps before it whatever is in its way.

Almost all persons of all ages were bowed down together, and scarce one was able to withstand the shock of the surprising operation. Old men and women who had been drunken wretches for many years, and some little children, not more than six or seven years of age, appeared in distress for their souls, as well as persons of middle age. And it was apparent these children were not merely frightened with seeing the general concern, but were made sensible of their danger, the badness of their hearts, and their misery without Christ. The most stubborn hearts were now obliged to bow. A principal man among the Indians who before thought his state good because he knew more than the generality of the Indians, and who with great confidence the day before told me he had been a Christian more than ten years, was now brought under solemn concern for his soul and wept bitterly. Another man, considerable in years, who had been a murderer, a poor-woman, and a notorious drunkard, was likewise now brought to cry for mercy with many tears, and to complain much that he could be no more concerned when he saw his danger so great.

"There were almost universally praying and crying for mercy in every part of the house, and many out of doors, and numbers could neither go nor stand; their concern was so great, each for himself, that none seemed to take any notice of those about them, but each prayed for themselves, and were, to their own apprehension, as much retired as if every one had been by himself in a desert, or rather they thought nothing about any but themselves, and so were every one praying apart although all together. It seemed to me there was an exact fulfillment of that prophecy, Zech. xii. 10, 12, for there was now 'A great mourning, like the mourning of Hadraddimon,' and each seemed to 'mourn apart.' Methought this had a near resemblance to the day of God's power, mentioned Josh. x. 14, for I must say I never saw any day like it in all respects; it was a day wherein the Lord did much destroy the kingdom of darkness among the people.

"This concern was most rational and just; those who had been awakened any considerable time complained especially of the badness of their hearts, and those newly awakened of the badness of their lives and actions, and all were afraid of the anger of God, and of everlasting misery as the desert of sin. Some of the white people who came out of curiosity to 'hear what this habbler would say' to the poor ignorant Indians were much awakened, and appeared to be wounded with a view of their perishing state.

"Those who had lately obtained relief were filled with comfort; they appeared calm and rejoiced in Christ Jesus, and some of them took their distressed friends by the hand, telling them of the goodness of Christ, and the comfort that is to be enjoyed in him, and invited them to come and give their hearts to him. And I could observe some of them in the most unaffected manner lifting up their eyes to heaven as if crying for mercy, while they saw the distress of the poor souls around them.

"August 9th. In the afternoon I discoursed to them publicly. There were now present about seventy persons. I opened and applied the parable of the sower, and was enabled to discourse with much plainness. There were many tears among them while I was discoursing, but no considerable cry, yet some were much affected with a few words spoken from Matt. xi. 29, with which I concluded. But while I was discoursing near night to two or three of the awakened persons a divine influence seemed to attend what was spoken, which caused the persons to cry out in anguish of soul, although I spoke not a word of terror, but on the contrary set before them the fullness of Christ's merits and his willingness to save all that came to him.

"The cry of these was heard by others, who though scattered before immediately gathered round. I then proceeded in the same strain of gospel invitation till they were all melted into tears and cries except two or three, and seemed in the greatest distress to find and secure an interest in the great Redeemer. Some who had but little more than a ruffle made in their passions the day before seemed now to be deeply affected, and the concern in general appeared near as prevalent as the day before. There was indeed a very great mourning among them, and yet every one seemed to mourn apart. For so great was their concern that almost every one was praying and crying for himself, as if none had been near. 'Guttummaukahumneh, guttummaukahumneh,' i. e., 'Have mercy upon me, have mercy upon me!' was the common cry.

"It was very affecting to see the poor Indians, who the other day were yelling in their idolatrous feasts, now crying to God with much importunity for and interest in his dear Son."

The most friendly relations existed between the missionaries and Rev. Mr. McKnight, and often they are said to have preached for each other.

¹ In the history of Monroe will be found much of interest concerning this place.

PIONEER NAMES.—The names of subscribers towards the purchase of the parsonage property of the Cranbury Presbyterian Church in 1758 have been handed down to the present generation on a worn and faded document. A list of them is presented as containing among many others those of residents within the present township limits at the date mentioned. Some of those not residents there were residents of South Brunswick, Monroe, and perhaps other adjacent townships as the county is now divided, and doubtless a few lived in the contiguous portions of what are now Somerset, Mercer, and Monmouth Counties. To residents of the territory represented by them these names will be of especial interest, and as those of helpers in the early progress of Cranbury they are entitled to insertion here: John Hume, James Gaston, Euphemia Wilson, Jonathan Combs, Barney Karney, Nathan Davis, Leaford Haughhawout, Henry Swinler, Matthias Mount, John Stevens, Joseph Clayton, Elizabeth Clun, Peter Perrine, Charles Barclay, Eliza Swain, Samuel Bayles, Isaac Davis, Peter Covenhoven, John Sutphen, Robert Davison, William Dorrance, Duncan Campbell, George Davison, John Thompson, Jr., Lucas Schenck, William Davison, Adam Newell, John Muirhead, Andrew Davison, John Reed, Ram Vanderbeek, Cornelius Voorhees, John Carson, Stephen Voorhees, Coert Voorhees, David Gilliland, Peter Bonham, Zachariah Gapen, Nehemiah Suttan, Adrian Bennett, Samuel Kerr, Eleanor Gilliland, James Mulligan, Daniel Disbrow, Elizabeth Wright, William Chela, Richard Jewell, Joseph Storey, John Storey, John Gordon, James Peters, Joseph Wilson, Catorene Disbrow, Cornelius Carhart, Richard Sparks, Arthur Vankirk, Nicholas Britton, Thomas Storey, Albert Cortelyou, Thomas Mershon, Charles McLean, Barnet Griggs, John Chapman, John Jewell, Benjamin Griggs, Cornelius Wyckoff, John Soden, William Guest, James English, Barent Hagerman, Stephen Ketcham, Hugh McCullom, Robert Magee, Andrew Wilson, John Gaston, Matthias Vankirk, John Johnston, Thomas Mount, Arthur Wyckoff, Menke Peters, John Stephenson, John Thompson, John Kerr, Jr., William Cole, Tobias Neiphews, John Faris, William Magee, Stephen Pangborn, Thomas Dier, Luke Smock, Richard Major, Lines Pangborn, John Wetherell.

The names below are of those who pledged money for the purpose of building the first church. The subscription was begun in 1785, and its object was attained in 1788: Charles Barclay, Matthew Griggs, Samuel Kerr, James Gaston, Henry Wagner, Jacob G. Bergen, William Covenhoven, Cornelius Arvin, Josiah Skelton, William Smith, John Mount, Reuben Davison, David Chambers, Humphrey Mount, John Duncan, Reuben Morris, Peter Covenhoven, John Erwin, John Perrine, Peter Gulick, William Sloan, Elias Lovberry, Richard Handley, Anna Chambers, Andrew Rowan, Nathaniel Hunt, John Wyckoff, William Dey, George McAvoy, Jacob Wyckoff, John erected by an act of the Senate and General Assembly of New Jersey, approved March 7, 1872.

The act constituted the inhabitants of the new township a body politic and corporate, to be known as the "inhabitants of the township of Cranbury, in the county of Middlesex;" directed that they hold their first town-meeting at the inn of William Stults, in Cranbury village, on the day set apart by law for holding the annual town-meetings of the other townships of Middlesex County; appointed Ezekiel Silvers, Matthew A. Rue, and D. Chambers Lewis judges of election, to hold and preside over the first town-meeting, and Edwin A. Brown town clerk of Cranbury, all to hold their offices until their successors should be elected and qualified; appointed Messrs. Silvers, Rue, and Chambers, above mentioned, commissioners to divide the township into convenient road districts; and provided that the town committees of the several townships of Cranbury, South Brunswick, and Monroe should meet at 10 A.M. on the second Tuesday of April, 1872, at Stults' inn in Cranbury village, and allot and divide between the said townships all their paupers which were chargeable to that township within the bounds of which they had acquired their settlements respectively, and to arrange an equitable division of the assets and liabilities of the three townships on the basis of the amount of their taxable property and the number of their taxable inhabitants respectively.

Villages and Hamlets.—CRANBURY.—Much of interest relative to Cranbury village is to be found in other portions of the history of Cranbury township. The builders of the mill and church were the earliest residents of the locality of which any record or tradition is extant, and the mill and the church themselves the earliest monuments erected to progress and civilization in the township. As the mill was the nucleus of the substantial growth of the settlement and later village, so the church gathered around it the best elements of enlightenment and advancement, and as surely led the way to the prosperity of the present as its older co-laborer the mill. This village has an added claim to historical interest from the fact that the American army passed through the place just previous to the battle of Monmouth.

The early growth of the village is supposed to have been slow, and in 1810 it contained only fifteen houses, eight north and seven south of Cranbury Brook. At what date it began to be regarded as of sufficient importance to contain a store is not known. There may have been a store-keeper in the settlement prior to David Chambers, who was trading there in 1800 near the mill, but if so no tradition of him has been handed down, nor is it known how long he had been in business there at that date, but he was there years afterward. As early as 1807, and for a few years later, a man named Halsey was keeping a store near the United States Hotel. Near this hotel also Mershon & Hawley had a store in 1812 and later, and Charles Carson from 1815 or 1816 until his death about eight years later. The next merchants are thought to have been Reuben Morris and Benjamin M. Clarke. The latter is said to have begun business (later than Morris, the pioneer at the J. H. Goodwin stand) where J. D. Chamberlin is now trading, about 1825 or 1830. It is possible that up to this time, and perhaps later, there were others who embarked in trade in the village previous to the beginning of those mentioned below, but the most persistent inquiry has failed to elicit their names.

A tavern which stood on the north side of Main Street, about six hundred feet east from the mill-pond, was built in the last century, and in 1805 was kept by Timothy Horner. About 1807, Samuel Disbrow took charge and kept it until he died, after which his widow, Sarah Disbrow, kept it many years, until it was torn down. Probably the oldest hotel now standing in the village is the American House, which was kept by Henry Wagoner at an early date. It has had many occupants, and about fourteen years ago passed into the possession of Mrs. Maria Bowne. The United States Hotel was built in 1790 by Peter Perrine as a dwelling. In 1808, Timothy Horner converted it into a hotel. Its occupants have been many. The present one, John G. Grover, assumed control in 1872.

The earliest resident physician was undoubtedly Dr. Titus, who came prior to 1800. Dr. Ralph Lott and Dr. Van Dyke came about that year. Dr. Horatio Sandsbury came about 1816; Dr. John Lott about 1825; Dr. Garret Voorhees about 1830; Dr. Selah Gulick about 1834.

The Village in 1840.—In 1840 there were in the village the stores of Garret G. Voorhees, Benjamin M.

Clarke, and John Dey. The first was the Goodwin store. The second was kept in the brick house now occupied by Joseph Chamberlain, and the proprietor lived in another part of the same building. The third was the store now occupied by John W. Duncan. The grist-mill and saw-mill were then owned by John I. Duncan. Drs. Gulick, Voorhees, and Lott were the resident physicians. Jacob Hagerman and Matthew A. Rue were wheelwrights. William Newton had a blacksmith's shop. The village Crispins were Isaac Brokaw, Jacob Snediker, and Harmon Conover. Two tanneries were owned by James Clark and Aaron Lane respectively. Isaac Van Arsdale had a batter's shop, and Jefferson Halsted a cabinet-shop. A man named Page was the Cranbury tailor. The National Hotel was kept by John Laning, and the United States Hotel by Abraham Voorhees.

From 1840 to 1882.—The store now managed by Mr. J. H. Goodwin is the oldest in the place, and was started by Mr. Reuben Morris many years ago. After passing through the hands of ex-Sheriff Voorhees, Mr. John S. Davison, Stults & Bro., Van Horn & Bergen, and afterwards Mr. Vincent D. Bergen, who still owns the property, it was rented by Mr. Goodwin about 1862.

Mr. J. D. Chamberlin, general merchant, started business with his brother, Mr. S. J. Chamberlin, about 1861, and rented the stand which he now occupies. In 1877 he purchased the property of Mr. William Warwick. The store, which is one of the oldest in the place, was established by Mr. Benjamin M. Clarke over fifty years ago. After purchasing the property the Messrs. Chamberlin Brothers remodeled and improved the same by putting in a large glass front, and also by building over the store a large public hall, the erection of which has been greatly appreciated by the people of our town. In connection with the store is an office of the American Union Telegraph Company, Frank Davis operator.

The store kept in 1840 by John Dey had formerly been kept by David Clark. From Dey it passed to Dey Conover, who rebuilt the building and in time transferred the business to James Conover, who was succeeded by his brother, who gave way to the present proprietor, John W. Duncan. The drug-store now owned by S. A. French and managed by Addison Stillwell was established several years ago by a man named Walker, from whom Mr. French purchased it in 1880.

In the building for the past few years occupied by the boot and shoe store and shop of D. W. Hoagland, Isaac Van Arsdale opened a store about 1844. Nelson Petty was a successor. Benjamin Sutton had a grocery-store where Cole's furniture and undertaking establishment now is. The latter establishment was purchased in 1833 by Ezekiel Silvers of his employer, who was a prior owner. Up to the year 1857 Mr. Silvers conducted the business alone. Associating with him Mr. Cole, the business continued until 1870 under the firm-name of Silvers & Cole, when Mr. Silvers retired, and Mr. Cole became sole proprietor. The store of John G. Grover was established in 1879.

The following were merchants in Cranbury in January, 1882: J. D. Chamberlin, James H. Goodwin, John W. Duncan, and John G. Grover. S. A. French was a druggist; D. W. Hoagland had a boot and shoe store.

Drs. Gulick, Lott, and Voorhees have been mentioned as physicians in the village in 1840. The first died a few years ago, the second prior to 1845, and the third about that date. Dr. Holmes, a later comer, died a little earlier than Dr. Gulick; and Dr. H. S. Clow, who came in 1849, beginning his professional career in Cranbury, died in January, 1882. Dr. Green, who had been in the place some years, went away about 1859, and Dr. Clark, a later comer, about two years ago. The present resident medical practitioners are Dr. John C. Holmes and Dr. Henry C. Symmes.

In January, 1882, Alexander S. Cole, undertaker, R. L. McDowell, coal dealer, William Steel, tobacco-nist, Jacob Price and John Davis, tailors, E. V. Wakeley, insurance agent, Charles Ehrlich, harness-maker, Jacob Snediker, shoemaker, Mrs. M. K. Christopher, confectioner, Mrs. L. Wakeley, proprietor of a confectionery, toy, and notion store, and Mrs. R. M. Vanderveer, Mrs. Emily Mouret, and Miss J. Fleming, milliners, were doing business at Cranbury. Mrs. W. A. Wakeley was postmistress.

A Mutual Fire Insurance Company was organized May 31, 1879, with Ezekiel Silvers as president, Richard C. Dey as vice-president, D. C. Lewis as treasurer, John G. Groves as secretary, and Alfred Davison, Isaac Covert, William S. Dey, John R. Hunt, Martin Crusier, Arnold F. Stout, Ezekiel Silvers, A. J. Duncan, and John Wyckoff as directors.

The initial number of the Cranbury News, R. M. Stults, editor and publisher, appeared Jan. 5, 1882. This is the first journalistic venture in the village.

CRANBURY STATION is a hamlet on the eastern border of the township, on the Camden and Amboy Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, lying partially in Monroe, and containing a store, a blacksmith-shop, a depot, several dwellings, and an establishment for pressing hay. The first merchant there was Abijah Applegate, who has been succeeded by Gibson & Voorhees, Voorhees & Stevens, and E. Stevens, the present merchant. A former blacksmith was W. W. Reed, deceased; the present one is John Wolfe. The hay-press is the property of William Perrine. A hotel was formerly kept by James Applegate, Nelson Petty, and Isaac Petty successively.

PLAINSBORO', partially the northwestern part of the township and partially in South Brunswick, contains the stores of John D. Van Doren and William Schooley, the hotel of Arthur Rading, built about 1800, a Methodist Church, built in 1812, and an old¹ church, a blacksmith-shop, a wheelwright's shop, and several dwellings.

Society History.—MIDDLESEX LODGE, No. 90, I. O. O. F., was instituted Feb. 1, 1849, and meets in the second story of the school-house near the First Presbyterian Church.

The first officers were F. H. Holmes, N. G.; Selah Gulick, V. G.; G. M. Burgess, Sec.; J. H. McChesney, Asst. Sec.; John R. Holmes, Treas. The lodge was officered as follows in January, 1882: Peter Rathgeber, N. G.; L. A. Rue, V. G.; John Davis, Sec.; Alfred Chamberlin, Treas.; W. S. McEwen, Chap.

Educational.—The first schools in the township were at Cranbury village. The early schools of Cranbury were supported by the payment of a stated tuition per scholar, and kept in small school-houses built by subscription, or by the combined efforts of the heads of families who clubbed together and erected them. The early teachers boarded around, staying with each family a week, more or less, or as long as he was welcome and liked the fare. The earliest remembered teacher at Cranbury was John Campbell, who was teaching in 1805, but doubtless there were schools there much earlier. John Van Kirk was teaching in 1808, and a man named Lowry in 1809.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The township is divided into five school districts under the operation of the common school law of the State. In the enumeration and nomenclature of the school districts of Middlesex County they are known as Plainsboro' District, No. 61; Cranbury Neck District, No. 52; North Cranbury District, No. 53; South Cranbury District, No. 54; and Wyckoff's Mills District, No. 61.

The number of school children in Cranbury township according to the census of 1880 was 342, residing in the several districts as follows: 61 in District No. 49, 35 in District No. 52, 123 in District No. 53, 73 in District No. 54, and 50 in District No. 61. The number in the township who attended private schools was estimated at 24, the number not attending school at 87. The total number of teachers employed was seven, all of whom were females, at an average salary of $36.50 per month. There were five school-houses in the township, all in good condition. Schools were kept open an average of nearly ten months during the year. The total amount received from all sources for public school purposes was $1959.43. Of this sum, $759.43 was devoted to District No. 53, and $300 each to Districts Nos. 49, 52, 54, and 61. Of this amount $1774.43 was the apportionment to the districts of the township from State appropriations, and $185 was raised by taxation in the township. The value of school property in the township was $6250, of which $1200 belonged to District No. 52, $550 to District No. 61, and $1500 to each of Districts Nos. 49, 53, and 54.

THE BRAINERD INSTITUTE.—The frequency of applications for admission to the college at Princeton by persons not fitted to enter that institution as students led the faculty and managers to the discussion of some means of affording such persons opportunities for preparation in the vicinity. This agitation resulted in a determination to encourage the establishment of a suitable preparatory institution either at Hightstown or Cranbury. The latter place was selected after some deliberation, and, with the above-mentioned object in view, a stock company was formed in 1865, with Elias Dey as president; William Snediker, as treasurer; Ezekiel Silvers, as secretary; and Elias Dey, George Farr, Derrick Perrine, William L. Schenck, Isaac Brokaw, Garret A. Snediker, and Ezekiel Silvers as trustees.

A building committee was appointed consisting of Derrick Perrine, Garret A. Snediker, and George Farr, and a four-story brick building was erected on spacious grounds which had been purchased north of Main Street, at its intersection with the Cranbury and Princeton turnpike. The school opened with Rev. S. E. Schenck as principal, Rev. T. D. Hoover having been first appointed to the position and refusing to serve. In September, 1870, Rev. Mr. Schenck was succeeded by William S. McNair, and the latter, in 1873, by Rev. Frederick Knighton, D.D. Since Dr. Knighton there have been several in charge. Rev. Joseph S. Van Dyke was appointed in 1879, and is yet in charge, with William E. Marshall as assistant and teacher.

Backward scholars and young pupils receive especial attention. The course of instruction is comprehensive and practical, and the drill most thorough. Pupils are prepared for business, for college, or for any scientific school. The latest, most approved methods of teaching are employed, and scholars are received at any time. Lessons are given on piano and organ, and opportunity is allowed for practice. The institute is well adapted for its purpose, and boarding pupils from abroad enjoy all the care and comfort of a home.

The association is at this time under the following management: Ezekiel Silvers, president; D. C. Lewis, treasurer and secretary; Ezekiel Silvers, D. C. Lewis, Dr. J. C. Holmes, P. R. Bergen, Derrick G. Perrine, William Hughes, and Isaiah D. Barclay.

Industrial Pursuits.—Although Cranbury has never been noted for the number of its manufactures, it was to its manufacturing facilities that it owed its early settlement, the water-power afforded by Cranbury Brook having been first utilized for manufacturing purposes one hundred and forty-four or one hundred and forty-five years ago.

The ancient grist-mill erected by Thomas Grubbs, as is reasonably supposed about 1737 or 1738, stood with frequent change of ownership and occasional repairs until destroyed by fire in 1860. It was soon rebuilt, and is grinding away as busily to-day as when patronized by the pioneers in Cranbury and adjoining townships. Prominent among its numerous owners since Grubbs and his successor (in 1741), John Collins, have been Nathaniel Hunt (as early as 1776), Randall Hunt, son of Nathaniel Hunt, William Schenck, Hamilton Jones, James Prall, Samuel Nutt, Alexander Snediker, Gabriel Ten Broeck, and M. K. Wilson. In April, 1881, it was leased by the present operator, John P. Wyckoff. For many years, until its destruction, there was a saw-mill in connection with it, which played its part in aiding the settlers and later residents to render their homes comfortable and erect buildings upon their farms and for various business purposes.

The Wyckoff mills at the extreme southeastern corner of the township, on the Millstone, were built at an early date by Peter Wyckoff,¹ who was succeeded in their ownership by David B. Wyckoff, who in 1871 was succeeded by John P. Wyckoff, his son, who in 1881 gave place to Frank Wescott.

Two other grist-mills in the township are Grover's mills, located on Cranbury Brook, about midway between Cranbury village and Plainsboro', and owned by Joseph H. Grover, and the Plainsboro' Mills, near Plainsboro', owned by George W. Thompson. To both of these Cranbury Brook supplies the motive-power.

Isaac Debow was a blacksmith at Cranbury as early as 1750, and for many years afterward. If he had any predecessors their names are unknown. There have been many disciples of Vulcan since his time. William Newton was the village blacksmith at Cranbury in 1840. The present representatives of the craft there are M. G. Rue and F. T. Labow. Prominent among former wheelwrights were Matthew A. Rue and John Hagerman. W. W. Rud was a blacksmith at Cranbury Station. At Cranbury two tanneries were formerly in existence; one of them was probably established by William Conover, and by him was sold, about 1820, to Aaron Lane, and was later owned by Henry Van Deventer. David Chambers had a tannery as early as 1806, which after some years passed to John Clark. The latter was succeeded by James Clark, and later again owned the tannery. Both tanneries were located on the brook near the old Cranbury mill, and both went out of use about twenty or twenty-five years ago. Isaac Van Arsdale manufactured hats for a few years in Cranbury about forty years ago.

In the early days there were many small distilleries in the township at different times and places. Matthew A. Rue erected a cider-mill at Cranbury in 1852, and has been more or less extensively engaged in cider manufacture since. When his factory is run to its full capacity three hundred bushels of apples are consumed daily. Nathaniel Britton has a distillery near Plainsboro'.

In the spring of 1861, Mr. P. R. Bergen leased the lower room of a wheelwright-shop then occupied by Joseph McChesney at Cranbury, on the corner of Monroe and Dey Streets. In 1865, business having increased largely, Mr. Bergen purchased the entire establishment. Since that time additional ground has been purchased and more buildings erected. At the present time he has over eight times the shop-room that he had in 1861, and has increased the working force from one man and a boy to nine men during the busy season, and six men during the balance of the year, in the manufacture of carriages and light wagons of every description.

The well-known American Steam Coffee and Spice Mills of Davison & Silvers was established by Mr. John S. Davison, the senior member of the firm, in October, 1865, who while engaged in the mercantile business in the village felt the necessity of supplying his customers with pure spices. Selling out his store goods to his brother, S. W. Davison (now of the firm of Lee, Davison & Dye, of Trenton), he commenced the manufacture of ground coffee and pure spice in a frame building formerly used as a bakery. Instead of steam he used a one-horse tread-power, which failed before the first roast was half done, and it had to be finished by hand. Coffee then was worth sixty cents per pound. Upon the failure of the horse-power a second-hand boiler and engine were procured. After getting the steam-power in operation, Mr. Davison found that he needed a partner, and selected Mr. John S. Silvers, then about twenty-four years of age, and the firm of Davison & Silvers was formed. Shortly after the new firm was established the building and contents were completely destroyed by fire. Immediately afterwards Davison & Silvers purchased the lot on which the factory now stands. Many friends volunteered to contribute all the carting necessary if the firm would erect a fire-proof stone building, which they were enabled to do at a small cost. Business having largely increased, in 1875 they enlarged their establishment by a two-story frame addition, about doubling their storage-room. At the present time the establishment is in a most thrifty condition. By manufacturing none but strictly reliable goods Messrs. Davison & Silvers have gained a wide reputation, and their goods are to be found in every State. Their trade has so largely increased within the past few years that they have deemed it wise to enlarge their factory some time during the present year.

The shirt-factory of Matthew A. Rue at Cranbury occupies two buildings, thirty-six feet by sixty and twenty feet by forty respectively, and was established in 1879. The shirts manufactured by Mr. Rue are cut out in New York, and returned to New York by him when finished.

The Cranbury Manufacturers were also extensively engaged in manufacturing shirts for New York parties in 1880-81. During the latter year they were succeeded by E. T. Daneer, who leased their factory, and has since continued the business, using sixty sewing-machines and employing sixty hands, in a building eighty feet by twenty and two stories high. The Cranbury Manufacturers were an association of the following-named persons: J. S. Davison, president; James H. Goodwin, treasurer; John G. Grover, secretary; J. S. Silvers, J. C. Holmes, R. L. McDowell, Alexander S. Cole, J. B. Chamberlin, John Chamberlin, Jones Chamberlin, S. A. French, and George Lane.

At no time in its history has the township had as many manufactories of various kinds as are now within its borders, a majority of them at Cranbury village, where the first enterprise was planted.

The First Presbyterian Church.—There was a Presbyterian Church more or less completely organized at Cranbury in July, 1739, when the church-lot previously mentioned as having been, in consideration of two pounds, transferred by James Rothead to Coert Van Voorhees and Thomas Storey was by the latter conveyed to "Nicholas Stevens and Peter Perrine, elders, and John Brown and William Magee, deacons, of the Presbyterian Church of Cranbury." No record can be found of the organization of this ancient church, though it is deemed probable it took place in 1738, immediately after the separation of the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians, who had, as has been stated, been joint owners of and worshippers in the "old church," in what is now Monroe.¹ The new building was erected in 1740, and stood for forty-eight years in the old cemetery on its highest point. Rev. Joseph G. Symmes gives the subsequent history of this region in a historical sermon delivered in 1867, as follows:

"The church had no settled pastor for four years. But the people were not negligent of the means of grace, as at every meeting of Presbytery it is recorded, 'Cranbury supplicated for supplies.' In June, 1741, Charles McKnight was taken under the care of the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and licensed probably in the fall of that year. He was called to Staten Island and Basking Ridge, and to several other places. But he was not settled until called to Cranbury, in 1744. He was at the same time called to Allentown. It is a matter of interest, to the speaker at least, that the Rev. Timothy Symmes, great-great-grandfather of your present pastor, was present as a member of Presbytery when the call was placed in Mr. McKnight's hands, and arrangements made for his installation; and Mr. McKnight recommended Mr. Symmes to Woodbury. The installation took place at Allentown, July 18, 1744, the Rev. William Tennent, of Freehold, preaching the sermon, and the exercise was accompanied with fasting and prayer. There was a contest between the two places as to where the pastor should reside. But Cranbury had the preference, and it is conjectured for this reason: Mr. James Rothead was disposed to favor religion, and then owning the southwest section of the town, he probably offered terms for the pastor's residence in the present parsonage, which decided his remaining in Cranbury. . . ." Referring to the fact that the missionary, David Brainerd, lodged with Rev. Mr. McKnight in 1745, Mr. Symmes inferred that McKnight, though unmarried, kept house, especially as Brainerd was his guest several times, continuing thus:

"That a parsonage was needed is evident from a record actually entered upon the minutes of Presbytery for Oct. 15, 1746, viz.: 'Mr. McKnight could not attend with the committee to install Mr. Hunter, because he was absent marrying a wife. . . .' But the dispute between Allentown and Cranbury concerning the residence of the minister became so strong that the Presbytery was called in to compose it, and did so by appointing a large committee, of whom John Brainerd was one. This committee met Oct. 12, 1748, and was opened with a sermon by William Tennent. They advised that the pastor should continue at Cranbury, and that Allentown should be allowed to employ a minister as soon as possible. But the double relation continued until 1756. The Rev. Mr. Snowden states, in a record written in 1791, that during all this time the elders and deacons in the two churches constituted but one session. But he states it as an uncertain thing, and it may well be doubted.

"But now for forty years it is impossible to learn any particulars as to the state of the church, for either no records were kept or they were lost. We can only learn a few facts from some legal documents and from records of Presbytery. From the last source we gather that Mr. McKnight was subjected to many trials at Cranbury, and hence he moved to Allentown in 1756. He was dismissed from Allentown in 1766, and settled at Shrewsbury and Middletown Point in 1767. It is indicative of the sentiments and influence of the man that he was seized by the British during the Revolutionary war and his church burned. He was released, and died soon after in New York, Jan. 1, 1778, and was buried in Trinity churchyard, where his grave may be seen to this day. Soon after Mr. McKnight left Cranbury the people of that church called the celebrated Alexander McWhorter. Presbytery met at Cranbury in July, 1759, to ordain Mr. McWhorter, because he was under appointment of the Synod to go to Virginia, but instead of going to Virginia he was settled in Newark. This church was without a stated pastor until 1762, a space of six years. But there is constant notice of applications to Presbytery for temporary supplies. And it is proof of the interest of the people in their church affairs that it was during this vacancy that the parsonage property was purchased."²

"The deed was given May 26, 1759, by George Jobs to John Stevens, John Thompson, and Leafeord Haughwout, calling for 150 acres, for the sum of £425 current money of New Jersey. George Jobs had bought the property of James Rothead in 1751. In 1770 this property was conveyed in trust to Charles Barclay, Joseph Clayton, and Arthur Wyckoff, and finally conveyed to the trustees of this church in 1790, which trustees had only then become incorporated under the new law, consisting of Nathaniel Hunt, Jonathan Combs, Thomas McDowell, Jacob Fisher, William Covenhoven, Samuel Longstreet, and Humphrey Mount, and the instrument was signed in the presence of Timothy Horner and Corlis Ingham. To complete the history of this matter, it is only necessary to be mentioned that the trustees of this church sold 60 acres of this tract in 1841. The remainder yet continues the property of the church. In 1761, Thomas Smith was received into the Presbytery from that of Suffolk, and ordered to supply Cranbury. He was called here in 1762, and installed in October of that year. From all that can be gathered, Mr. Smith was a man of piety and excellent spirit. But his health was very precarious, and his duties were many of them neglected, his name seldom appearing as present at meetings of Presbytery. How he performed his duties in the church can only be gathered from the fact that he left no records whatever. If Mr. McKnight left any records they were lost, and Mr. Smith's successor found nothing but a few loose scraps of paper, containing nothing of value. But that Mr. Smith was interested in the affairs of the church may be inferred from the fact that Presbytery met in Cranbury six or seven times during his pastorate. We may lament this loss of records, because we can know nothing of the state of the church during our war of independence. It is to be regretted because we can never recover a list of members and officers. It is more to be regretted because the loss of marriage records has been in some instances a serious matter. We have still, on a time-stained sheet, the names of subscribers to Mr. Smith's support. A proposition to raise salary by assessing the pews had been voted down in 1750. And so a contract was drawn up, binding the subscribers, their heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay the sums affixed, the largest being two pounds and the smallest six shillings. It was stipulated that Mr. Smith should preach every sixth Sabbath in the neighborhood of Cornelius Voorhees, which became the nucleus of the Dutch Neck Church. Whether this arrangement continued during Mr. Smith's pastorate does not appear. The proposition of assessing the pews continued to be discussed until 1773, when it was adopted. And we have a plan of the original church, drawn April 1st of that year, with the price attached, the highest being three pounds; and a tax for salary was levied on the pews, the highest being eighteen shillings. And the plan is a curiosity. The pulpit was on the north side of the church, in a square that rested on a long aisle running east and west; there was a door at each end of this aisle. The main door was at the end of a short aisle directly in front of the pulpit. The pews on each side of this short aisle, filling down the pulpit square, were placed lengthwise of the church, all the other pews across, and the gallery stairs opened out of doors.

"It is a pleasing fact, as showing that amid the confusion of war this church enjoyed the means of grace, that the Presbytery met in Cranbury in April, 1778, in the midst of the exciting scenes of which New Jersey was then the theatre. And it is indicative of growth that it was under Mr. Smith's ministry a new house of worship was erected. The project was agitated several years before it was begun; indeed, preparations were made three years before the house was built. The old subscription list is still in existence, and shows that the first name, that of Charles Barclay, was signed Dec. 13, 1755.¹ The terms prove that it was intended the subscription should be good: 'We, the under subscribers, do, each one for himself, and not one as security for another, promise and oblige ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay, or cause to be paid, to Nathaniel Hunt, Esq., Treasurer of the Presbyterian Congregation of Cranbury, or to his successor in office,' etc. The house was not built until 1788, only the year before Mr. Smith's death. It was built where the present house now stands, and partly upon the very same foundations. Mr. Jacob Fisher, one of the elders, was the builder. There is no hint as to the time of its dedication. The whole cost, at least the whole amount of subscriptions, was twelve hundred and forty-seven pounds. The salary of the pastor had been £60 until the move-meant for the new church, then it was raised to £100, or $500. It is certainly proof of stability at least on the part of our fathers that this salary of $500 was continued until 1857. Mr. Smith had long been infirm, his infirmities being of such a nature that he was often apprehensive that his end would come in a long and painful illness. He had often prayed that he might be spared such a trial, and that his end might be by some speedy method. And his prayer was mercifully answered, for on Wednesday evening, Dec. 23, 1788, he was attending a prayer-meeting at a private house,—one that stood on the spot now occupied by the residence of Mr. William M. Perrine,—and while in the act of prayer he fell back into a chair and was carried home. There, apparently conscious, but unable to utter intelligible words, in two hours he gently fell asleep. His remains rest among the people for whom he labored and among whom he died.

"After Mr. Smith's death the church depended upon temporary supplies, but only for a few months. During the following summer Mr. Gilbert T. Snowden, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, frequently preached here, and on the 21st of September, 1790, he was called to the pastorate. On the 24th of November following, Presbytery met at Cranbury to ordain and install Mr. Snowden. Among those present on this occasion were Dr. Witherspoon, Dr. John Woodhull, Dr. Stanhope S. Smith, and Dr. J. F. Armstrong, men long to be remembered. Dr. Witherspoon being then, and Dr. Smith afterwards, president of Princeton College. Dr. Smith preached the sermon from 2 Tim. ii. 2, and Dr. Woodhull delivered the charges. Mr. Snowden was a man of more than ordinary abilities and piety. He devoted himself with great zeal and diligence to promote the interests of the church. He found all of its affairs in great disorder, and his first work was to arrange and settle them. Six new elders and five deacons were ordained in less than two years after his settlement. His testimony is that he found that sound doctrine had been preached, and that the people relished such preaching. But pastoral visiting, catechising the children, and discipline had been almost entirely neglected, owing to infirmities which Mr. Smith greatly lamented. From this time we have very full records. And from them one may be led to judge that Mr. Snowden entered upon the work of discipline with too much zeal. It is very certain this would be the judgment of some in our day when they read such a record as this: 'The session prohibited one member coming to the communion table, and gave her and another member an exhortation to use more gentle and decent language, and to keep from intermeddling with and speaking of her neighbor's affairs improperly.' Mr. Snowden instituted meetings of session, to be held on the first Monday of every month, to meet at one o'clock and adjourn at five o'clock, neither sooner nor later, and excuses for absence from these meetings were required, the fact of excuse being entered upon the records. The session was composed of the elders and deacons. Accompanied with an elder, Mr. Snowden made visits to his families, reporting to the monthly meeting the number visited, their circumstances and spiritual condition, and especially the numbers where the family altar was erected. Frequent days of fasting were appointed on account of the low state of religion, and once at least with reference to the yellow fever then raging in the near neighborhood. Tokens were ordered to be distributed among those desiring to come to the Lord's table. After lengthy discussions it was resolved by the session that 'singing in the church should be performed without giving out the line.' But it was found that the people were opposed to the innovation, and so Mr. Ezekiel Price and Mr. William McChesney were sent for and engaged, 'the people carefully and constantly to set the tune, and the latter to give out the line, for which the session engaged to get them exempted from the salary they now pay.' Six years afterwards, in 1799, the session again called upon the people for a vote on this subject, when reading the line was dispensed with. Mr. Snowden was greatly exercised during the whole of his short ministry with cases of discipline, some long and painful, some settled only after an appeal to Presbytery, and some bequeathed to his successor. It is one of the saddest lessons of history to read the story of the quarrels of those who now sleep together in the dust, and quarrels often about causes trivial as the small dust of the balance. . . .

"Mr. Snowden was not satisfied with the parsonage-house, and so built himself a house, the one now occupied by Mr. Nelson Petty, and received the rent of the parsonage. But in December, 1793, he procured the adoption of a resolution 'highly approving of the measure proposed to erect a dwelling-house on the parsonage,' particularly as Mr. Snowden offered £40 towards it, and a meeting of the congregation was called 'to attend to the business.' Whether the meeting was held or what further action was had is not known. But this is certain, a new house was not erected. During the first years of Mr. Snowden's successor the house was repaired, and the southern half added to it, and the house then became very much what it is now. A portion of it, then, must be considerably more than a hundred years old. But, redolent of prayers and sacred with associations, it would be almost sacrilege to pull it down. Indefatigable worker as he was, Mr. Snowden's race was soon run. In November, 1796, he last met his session, when he was zealously engaged in promoting the comfort of Rev. Mr. Smith's family. Soon after, having occasion to visit New York, he returned ill with yellow fever, which spread great consternation. He was faithfully cared for, as well as the case would admit, by his servants, and by them carried to his last resting-place, Feb. 20, 1797. He, too, rests among the people among whom he spent the whole of his short ministerial life. A sermon was preached on the occasion of his death by Dr. S. S. Smith from Rev. xiv. 13, and his congregation paid every tribute of respect to his memory which a grateful people could pay to the memory of a faithful pastor.

"Being thus suddenly deprived of their under-shepherd, the session sent one of their number to solicit supplies from the Presbytery. Among those appointed by Presbytery to supply the vacancy was George Spafford Woodhull, a son of Dr. John Woodhull, of Freehold. He had been licensed at a meeting of Presbytery held in Cranbury, Nov. 14, 1797, and was appointed to supply at discretion. He performed the duty so much to the satisfaction of the people that on the 6th day of March, 1798, a meeting of the congregation was held, which was opened by a sermon by Rev. Samuel F. Snowden, after which a unanimous call was voted to Mr. Woodhull to become the pastor of the church. He found it in a more vigorous state than with his predecessor. And he seems to have continued in exercise the system of order and catechetical instruction and visitation introduced by Mr. Snowden. Cases of discipline were not so numerous, and the church increased more rapidly in numbers. The Lord's Supper continued to be administered four times in the year, according to the custom established by Mr. Snowden. Previous to his time there had been no regular seasons. It is recorded that on the 8th of May, 1803, there was a snow-storm of such severity that the administration of the Lord's Supper was deferred to the third Sabbath of June. Early in the next pastorate the custom of holding three communion seasons in the year was established and still continues. . . . Dr. Woodhull, having been pastor of this church for twenty-two years, in April, 1820, determined to accept a call from the church in Princeton. He remained there for twelve years, when he removed to Middletown Point. Here he had labored but two years when an attack of scarlet fever ended his life on the 25th of September, 1834, and here his remains were laid to rest. His memory is still spoken of with affectionate respect by many in this community. His sojourn among this people was pleasant to himself, and his labors were fruitful of much good.

"During this time there was residing at Lamiington James Henry, a colonel in the New Jersey militia. On the 7th of June, 1797, the year Mr. Snowden died, a son, and his only one, was born to Col. Henry, whom he named Symmes Cleves for his brother-in-law, Judge John Cleves Symmes. This son early entered Princeton College, graduating there in 1815 at the age of eighteen. He was brought to a knowledge of Christ during the remarkable revival in college of 1815, to which many eminent men of God date their spiritual birth. He entered at once the seminary at Princeton, where he graduated in 1818. He was licensed the previous year, October, 1817, by the Presbytery of Newton, being but little more than twenty years of age. After filling various temporary engagements in Massachusetts, New York, Philadelphia, and Virginia, he returned to Princeton in 1820. Here he received simultaneous calls from Cranbury and New Brunswick. His final decision was to accept the former. . . . Within ten years after his settlement the church had more than doubled her membership, the number admitted during that period being two hundred and twenty-eight. This growth continued until the church was filled to overflowing, and a diversity of sentiment arose with reference to the building of a new house of worship. This diversity resulted in the formation of the Second Church of Cranbury, which was organized by a committee of Presbytery, June 8, 1838. . . . In the next year, 1839, those who remained in the old church resolved on rebuilding their house of worship. They retained the old frame, and added to it considerably. The work was finished so that the dedication services were held on the first day of January, 1840, Dr. Archibald Alexander preaching the sermon. Thence the affairs of the church moved quietly and prosperously along until 1857, when the church was again bereft of her under-shepherd. In the midst of preparing a sermon on the text, 'In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth into an holy temple in the Lord,' Dr. Henry was called to attend a funeral. In this service he took a violent cold, which at once fastened upon the infirmity in his throat that was contracted thirty years before, developing into an inflammation of the bronchial membrane. He at once recognized his approaching end, though none around him were alarmed. On the following Sabbath afternoon, March 22, 1857, whilst his people were assembled in his church, having taken a farewell look at this lower world, he walked calmly to his bed, and taking there his accustomed place he looked up and beheld the gates of heaven open to receive him, and passed away as gently as a child falls to sleep in its mother's arms. On the succeeding Thursday his well-beloved and loving people followed his remains to the grave, and instantly turned their eyes upon his son-in-law, the Rev. Joseph G. Symmes, then of Madison, Ind., to fill the vacant place. . . . Let me conclude this sketch with a reference to two facts in the history of this church that are remarkable, or at least are matters of thanksgiving. One is that this church, though one hundred and thirty years old, has had but six pastors and no stated supply. Mr. Smith and Mr. Woodhull each served a few months as supply, but it was only as a trial for a pastorate. There was indeed a space of six years after Mr. McKnight left when there was no pastor, but the people more than once called for one, and the session was constantly appearing in Presbytery supplicating temporary supplies. There seemed to be no disposition to have a minister among them except as regularly settled. And then for more than a hundred years this is the record: Mr. Smith was settled in 1762, and died Dec. 23, 1789; Mr. Snowden was installed Nov. 24, 1790, and died Feb. 20, 1797; Dr. Woodhull was installed June 6, 1798, and left April, 1820; Dr. Henry was installed Aug. 8, 1820, and died March 22, 1857; and the present pastor was installed May 28, 1857. It is seldom such a close succession in the pastoral office can be found for so long a period.

"Colonies have gone out to form the following churches in whole or in part: Spotswood Reformed (Dutch) Church; Dutch Neck, organized in 1816; Millstone, organized in 1820; Second Cranbury, 1838; Jamesburg, 1854; Manalapan, 1856; and Hightstown, 1857."

In 1869 a church was organized at Dayton, fifty-six of whose fifty-eight members were from the two Cranbury churches. The pastorate of Rev. Mr. Symmes has been a signally successful one, and bids fair to terminate only with his life. The following is a list of the ruling elders so far as the records permit us to present their names. For the first fifty years there is an imperfection in the record of elders that cannot now be corrected; where only one date is given, that of dismissal or death does not appear or has not arrived:¹

ert English, 1744; John Thompson, 1744; Matthias Mount,* 1744, 1744-91; Jonathan Combs,* 1748-1800; Samnel Bailey,* 1748-1802; Cornelius Arvin,* 1748-91; Jonathan Combs, Jr.,* 1791-1803; William Perrine,* 1791-1820; Jacob Fisher,* 1791-1837; Humphrey Mount,* 1792-1801; Garret Snediker,* 1792-1825; Matthias Mount, Jr.,* 1792-1807; John Slayback,† 1792-1816; Isaac Snowden,† 1798-1806; John Mount,* 1802-4; Enos Baldwin,* 1802-21; Thomas Allen,† 1804-5; Israel Baldwin,† 1804-25; Henry Stults,* 1813-32; Richard Reid,† 1813-27; George Morris,* 1813-56; Abraham Bergen,* 1813-26; John Davison,* 1821-31; Derrick Griggs,* 1821-41; John Dey,* 1821-47; Thomas Duncan,* 1826-55; John Stinaker,* 1826-37; Lewis W. Stults, 1870; John Gibson, 1870; Peter R. Bergen, 1870; William Duncan, 1870; Edmund O. Howell, 1873; William E. Cole, 1877.

William M. Perrine, John M. Chamberlin, Garret S. Stults, William H. Thomas, David J. Clayton, Joseph P. Dey, Alexander S. Stults, Samuel J. Bergen, 1871; Jacob Bergen, 1877.

The Second Presbyterian Church.—In the above quotations from the historical sermon of Rev. Joseph G. Symmes, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, reference is made to the cause which led to the organization of the Second Presbyterian Church. Alluding to the organization of the Second Church he says, "And this result, it is now plainly to be seen, was ordered in the wisdom of God for the furtherance of the kingdom of his Son. None now can fail to see that this was just what was needed. A full church must either extend its growth beyond its own borders or decline. . . . The Second Church went rapidly forward, side by side with the mother-church, and we feel that we are almost as one congregation with two houses of worship."

The causes that led to the separation are thus referred to in the records of the Second Church:

"A number of the members of the First Presbyterian Church in Cranbury finding themselves unable to obtain adequate room for their families to worship in their old church, and having endeavored in vain to obtain either an enlargement of that edifice or the erection of a new and more spacious one, thought it their duty to withdraw and erect a new house of worship for themselves and such others as might unite with them."

¹ Those marked with a * are deceased; those marked thus † have been dismissed.

Accordingly in the autumn of 1837 they commenced the erection of a new building, which was completed in June, 1838, and was dedicated June 26, 1838. The said members also, by delegate duly appointed for that purpose, applied to the Presbytery of New Brunswick to take measures for organizing themselves into a new church. The Presbytery having had the subject before them repeatedly at previous meetings, June 19, 1838, in conformity with their request, appointed Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., professor in the theological seminary at Princeton, and Rev. David Comfort, pastor of the church in Kingston, a committee to attend as soon as convenient and organize a second church in Cranbury.

The committee attended at Cranbury agreeable to due notice given June 28, 1838, and performed the service for which they were appointed. A sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Miller from Acts xiv. 23. After the sermon testimonials of membership and dismission from the First Church in Cranbury were produced in favor of the following-named persons:

Dominicus Mershon, Gertrude Mershon, Isaac G. Snediker, Jacob Snediker, Mrs. Catharine Snediker, Aaron Lane, Elias Dey, Mrs. Eliza Dey, Miss Leah Stults, Dr. Garret P. Voorhees, Mrs. Cornelia Voorhees, George Barclay, Mrs. Margaret Barclay, Henry Lane, James Clark, Mrs. Sarah Clark, William Hutchinson, Benjamin M. Clark, Mrs. Violetta Clark, Mrs. Ellen Dey, Garret S. Davison, Mrs. Ann Davison, Sarah Schenck, Reuben Morris, Mrs. Catharine Morris, George Davison, Mrs. Mary Davison, Mrs. Margaret Snediker, Miss Mahala Everett, Miss Keturah E. Everett, John Covert, and Mrs. Elizabeth Covert.

The first ruling elders were Jacob Snediker, Elias Dey, Aaron Lane, Isaac G. Snediker, Dominicus Mershon, and John Covert. The elders now serving are J. D. Barclay, D. C. Lewis, J. H. Stults, and J. S. Silvers. The deacons are J. S. Dey, J. T. Mershon, Peter Barclay, John H. Dey, J. G. Grover, Frank Brown, James Faw, and William Stults.

Rev. J. W. Blythe was installed first pastor in 1838. His successors, with the years in which they have been installed, have been as follows: Rev. Thomas D. Hoover, 1856; Rev. J. B. H. Janeway, 1868; and Rev. J. L. Van Dyke, 1869.

A chapel, built in 1839-40 on the site of the present one, was sold in 1869, removed,¹ and replaced by the latter at a cost of $3000. The house of worship and the lot on which it is built are valued at $12,000. The value of the parsonage is $4000.

The present membership of the Second Church is 325. Many members of this church united with the Jamesburg Church in 1854, the Manalapan Church in 1856, the Hightstown Church in 1857, and the Dayton Church in 1869.

The Sunday-school was organized in 1838, with Benjamin M. Clark as first superintendent. Mr.

Clark was succeeded in 1860 by the present superintendent, J. S. Davison. The school numbers about one hundred and thirty scholars, and has a library of one hundred and twenty-five volumes.

The Old Baptist Church.—Some Baptists seem to have located in Cranbury at an early date, and there was a Baptist Church planted in the village in 1749. In 1788 it was removed to Hightstown, where it has grown into a large and flourishing congregation. The old Baptist burying-ground is elsewhere referred to.

The Methodist Episcopal Church of Cranbury.—Previous to 1847 Methodist services were held in Cranbury at the houses of members of an organization of that denomination which had then been formed, and at times in the village school-house. December 10th that year the organization was perfected, and a church was soon incorporated, of which the following-named persons were the first trustees: Matthew A. Rue, Isaac Silvers, Elijah Brown, Gilbert S. Day, James Prall, and Reuben Sutphin.

A lot was purchased of George W. Shenck, and the erection of a house of worship begun. Dec. 10, 1848, the corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies. The basement of the building was ready for occupation, and first used by the congregation in the spring of 1849, and the church was completed and dedicated by Rev. Wesley Burtine and others March 13, 1851. In 1868 the membership had so increased that the church was inadequate to the accommodation of the congregation, and it was enlarged, thoroughly renovated, and provided with a spire and bell, which until then had been wanting. The present value of the church property, including a parsonage worth $1200, is $5200.

The successive pastors of this church, with the dates at which they have respectively begun their labors, are as follows:

Revs. Isaac Hugg, 1847; Samuel Van Zandt, 1849; F. Loomis, 1850; John B. Hill, 1851; — Smith, 1852; Isaac W. Hough, 1854; Francis F. Wolfe, 1855; George H. Jones, 1856; Daniel L. Adams, 1858; Joseph Jones, 1859; J. T. Tucker, 1861; B. T. Woolston, 1863; J. W. McDougall, 1865; Alexander Gilmore, 1866; C. D. Mead, 1867; J. H. Stockton, 1868; T. C. Barman, 1870; J. F. Heileman, 1873; W. S. McGowan, 1875; T. D. Sleeper, 1877; S. Goldsmith, 1878; E. A. Bray, 1878; Enoch Green, 1879; W. N. Osborne, 1881.

The membership is one hundred and two. The Sunday-school was organized in 1848. It has a membership of fifty. The library contains one hundred and twenty-five volumes. The superintendent is A. H. Snow.

In January, 1882, the stewards of this church were E. V. Wakely, recorder; Alexander S. Cole, E. R. Van Dusen, A. H. Snow, E. Brown, W. H. Reynolds, T. L. Reed, and B. C. Reynolds. The trustees were Samuel Nutt, president; E. R. Van Dusen, secretary and treasurer; Alexander S. Cole, Robert P. Mason, Matthew Reynolds, and Joseph Reynolds.

The African Methodist Church.—Formerly there was an African Methodist Church in a portion of Cranbury village locally known as "Africa" and "the colored neighborhood." The organization was always weak, and finally and some years ago its little house of worship was converted into a dwelling.

Burial-Places.—THE BRAINERD CEMETERY.—Brainerd Cemetery is located on Main Street, Cranbury, south of the brook. Its affairs are under the management of the following officers and trustees: John G. Stults, president; E. O. Howell, treasurer; A. S. Applegate, secretary; Vincent Perrine, W. I. Stults, and Ellison Dey. This burying-ground was donated to the First Presbyterian Church of Cranbury by James Rothead in 1740, and embraces five acres. It was laid out in lots in 1858. Burials were made there soon after the donation of the land. It is not known that there were earlier ones elsewhere in the township.

The following inscriptions are copied from headstones in this cemetery, in which about four thousand bodies are supposed to be buried:

"Here lies the body of John, son of Henry and Catherine Diabrow, who departed this life January the 3rd, ANNO DOMINI, one thousand, seven hundred and forty-eight."

"Here lies the body of James Cofton, son of Hugh and Jane Cofton, who departed this life October 20th, 1758."

"In memory of Catharine, wife of Isaiah Shaw, who departed this life March the 3rd, 1767."

"In memory of Susannah Reid, who departed this life August 12th, 1792."

"In memory of Margaret, wife of William Reid, who departed this life November 22nd, 1793."

"In memory of Phoebe, wife of Daniel Duncan, who departed this life July 23rd, 1795."

"In memory of John Duncan, who departed this life May 21st, 1795."

Many headstones in this cemetery bear no inscriptions. The inscriptions on some are illegible. Here was erected by "his many friends" a fine monument to the memory of the engineer for the various railroad companies that constructed lines of railway through this portion of the State, "Maj.-Gen. William Cook, born at Hightstown, N. J., May 29, 1801; died at Hoboken, N. J., April 21, 1865."

Here is also a monument erected to the memory of soldiers from the townships of Cranbury, Monroe, and South Brunswick who lost their lives in service during the late civil war. It bears the following names and dates of death:

"Charles R. Stout, Co. G, N. J. V., June 27, 1862; Winchester S. Bennett, Co. D, 1st N. J. V., June 29, 1862; Austin W. Roberts, Co. G, 1st N. J. V., Dec. 12, 1862; Perley F. Winchester, Co. THE OLD BAPTIST BURYING-GROUND.—During the period of the Cranbury Baptist Church (1749–88) a burying-ground was in use by that denomination, which has been long neglected and contains many early graves, whose location and the names of whose occupants will never be known. Only four headstones remain standing, and only two or three are to be found lying on the ground. The inscriptions on the latter are undecipherable. The following inscriptions are copied from the four headstones which are yet supposed to mark the resting-place of the persons whose names they bear:

"Here lies buried the body of John, son of Joseph and Margaret Taylor, who departed this life January 20th, 1761."

"In memory of John Chamberlain, who departed this life March 15th, 1783, aged 71."

"In memory of Hannah Chamberlain, who departed this life June 30th, 1807."

"In memory of James Perrine, who departed this life March 26th, 1811, aged 79 years and 10 months."

THE BURYING-GROUND OF THE SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—In the yard of the Second Presbyterian Church at Cranbury is a burying-ground, which has been laid out in lots and is in charge of James Dafer. Its area is about three acres, and it was opened soon after the erection of the church (1837–38), and contains many graves. The proceeds from the sale of lots are devoted to improvements.
